THE MUSICAL TIMES

FOUNDED 1844

JANUARY 1, 1914.

"The Cramer Pianoforte with the new Patent Soundboard impresses me much; it seems to me to add greatly to the tone. The touch is good."

(Extract from a letter from Sir Frederick Bridge, Organist at Westminster Abbey since 1875; Conductor of Royal Choral Society since 1896; King Edward Professor of Music, University of London, and Professor of Harmony, Royal College of Music, &c., &c.)

IN these words Sir Frederick Bridge praises the superb Cramer British-made Pianoforte—the proved best of all Pianos, because the Cramer is richer in tonal-qualities and finer in the responsiveness and quality of its action. Every good judge of musical instruments will agree with what Sir Frederick Bridge says in the "Daily Express," of October 25th:—

"English Pianos are immeasurably superior, and it is both good patriotism and good music to support the British-made Piano. This is not only my opinion, but also that of all the leading members of the Worshipful Company of Musicians."

Before you decide on any other instrument, in your own interest call, inspect—and test—the Cramer. If you cannot call, please write for Illustrated Catalogue No. 6 of

The Worthiness OF THE SMALLER RUSHWORTH LIVERPOOL-BUILT CHURCH ORGANS

THE GLAMOUR of Size, Complexity, and Costliness counts for little with the true Musician. He recognises that the Organ suitable for the small Church or Chapel in country or town is devoted to the same high purpose as the most majestic Cathedral Organ. —That the true standards of Worthiness must therefore be the same in both cases.

Upon this basis every RUSHWORTH Organ—irrespective of size or cost—is planned and built. AND it is a source of the greatest pride to Rushworth and Dreaper that eminent Religious and Musical authorities have so frequently cited small RUSHWORTH Organs as models of skilful planning, sincere craftsmanship, and ideal beauty and balance of Tone.

CHAMBER ORGANS. Particulars of fine RUSHWORTH Chamber Organs recently erected in Liverpool and vicinity furnished upon request.

A new book of critical and authoritative Opinions upon the distinctive characteristics of varying types of RUSHWORTH Organs will be sent free to any address at home or abroad.

A VALUABLE BOOK FOR TEACHERS AND STUDENTS.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

ELENA GERHARDT.

The cult of Lieder-singing has made considerable advance in this country of late years. It is perceived more clearly than it was that the Art-Lied, as the term is understood in Germany, is a form of the alliance of lyrics and music that is capable of a peculiar appeal. Lieder touch in turn every mood and emotion of which the human soul is capable. A recital at which a score or more masterpieces are presented by a great exponent is a pageant of the joys and sorrows of humanity,—the sorrows as a rule predominating. A Lieder-singer must be prepared to endure a deal of woe, and must learn to suffer and be strong. A large proportion of the lyrics that have attracted the world's greatest composers are to do with the pangs of despised love and the apparently still more acute discomfort of the accepted: obviously a choice of evils. There are many singers, but few can sing and fewer still can interpret. It is indeed no small matter to undertake to deliver the message of intimate poetry and subtle music. Only the elect can hope to succeed. But when this success is achieved, what deeper satisfaction can the art of music yield? It is of one of the universally-acknowledged and supreme queens of Lieder interpretation that we design to write in this article.

Elena Gerhardt was born at Leipsic in 1883. Her parents were good musical amateurs. She is the only one of her sex in the family of eight children, and all her seven brothers are gifted with good voices. A young brother is now being trained with the view to a career as a singer. As a child Miss Gerhardt sang in an unambitious way in her social circle, but she did not begin to study seriously until she was sixteen years of age. She then entered the Leipsic Conservatoire, and became a pupil of Madame Marie Hedmond, a Bohemian lady. Under this distinguished teacher Miss Gerhardt soon developed her natural talent, but there was no haste in bringing her forward, an act of foresight that probably saved this great singer for the world. Students who hope to succeed as singers should note that Miss Gerhardt for two years worked tranquilly at Bordogni's well-known studies before she was entrusted with her first song, which was Brahms's 'Am Sonntag Morgen.' She relates that on the evening of the day on which the song was given her to learn, she met her teacher (Madame Hedmond) at a concert, and told her that already she had worked out its interpretation. 'We shall see to-morrow at the lesson: I want first to hear it,' Madame Hedmond replied. It was then realised that the greatest gift the gods can bestow on a singer,—the power to assimilate and give out the message of an artistic creation,—was happily there, an inspiration which no one can plant but which can only be developed where the seed exists.

In these early days of her taste and inclination, her mood was to favour sad songs, and thus to draw upon only a part of the great comprehensive temperament we know of now. At any time a singer can sound a deeper note of sympathetic pathetic expression by a song that appeals to sad emotion than by one that is joyous and buoyant, however pleasing and attractive it may be. It was only gradually that Miss Gerhardt plumbed the depths of her catholic temperament. For four years she remained in the Conservatoire, and then on her twentieth birthday she gave her first concert. On this auspicious occasion she enjoyed the assistance as an accompanist of Arthur Nikisch, who had offered his services after having just previously heard her sing at the Conservatoire. Thus began an artistic friendship and co-operation that has led to incomparable results. Miss Gerhardt declares that it was Nikisch who taught her how to build up climaxes gradually, conserving the power of the tone until there was need for the greatest sonority and intensity. She adds:

Very often young undeveloped singers, without the proper foundation of vocal training, go on the stage and scream Wagner with a big voice, making incessant climaxes, and in a year or two they are left with only a hard, penetrating quality of tone. But if one sings properly, even dramatic declamation does not ruin the voice. The true Lieder-singer who controls the output can interpret Wagner, because he or she must of necessity express the word-mood.

After leaving the Conservatoire she studied for three years privately under Madame Hedmond. What a lesson to ambitious amateurs and half-fledged professionals who scorn full study! What a tribute to the faith Miss Gerhardt had in her teacher! Miss Gerhardt says that she has had no desire to appear in opera, being quite content to specialise in Lieder. Opera involves hard work and many vocal risks for a singer, but it is clear that it was not because Miss Gerhardt shrank from this ordeal that she chose the concert-singer's career, for she has memorised no fewer than 700 songs. Inasmuch as she has been only ten years before the public, she has acquired an average of seventy songs each year. She has studied all the songs of Schubert (about 600!), Schumann, and Brahms—even those written for men's voices. She thinks that Schubert should not be studied until a singer has had experience of much other music. The young and inexperienced try to put too much into the songs of this composer. She says she went back to Schubert after singing a number of more modern songs, and 'found in his simplicity a redoubled charm.' She has a great regard for the songs of Hugo Wolf, whose genius in the Lieder form is now so widely recognised. No other singer before the public has helped to reveal the subtlety and intensity of this composer in a more fascinating way than has Miss Gerhardt.

Discoursing of her work and method of study she says that in choosing songs the words are a primary consideration. They must have some message, some poetical value and significance, in order to appeal to her. Blood cannot be drawn from a stone. Then there is the view of the composer of the music to consider. How does he interpret the poet? When this is discovered and assimilated there is the inevitable glamour of the personal self-expression of the singer to add without a disturbance of the other values. The diction has to be made perfectly clear, and the poise of each word and syllable calculated; the verbal phrasing has to show the sense and yet not to be in conflict with the musical phrasing which is the soul of the purely musical appeal. Pace is discovered by experiment and feeling. Control of breathing is a foundation study on technique. Miss Gerhardt studied it first as a separate physical act. She breathes noiselessly, and never exhausts the lungs; and she is able to take quick short breaths almost imperceptibly. In order always to have enough breath and to spare after long phrases she practises singing double phrases to one breath. Listening to Miss Gerhardt one feels that phrasing is governed not by the details of punctuation but by the whole sense of the words. The comma, for instance, which is so often unduly worshipped by singers, is not necessarily made aural in the phrasing, although it may be felt where a break helps the sense and does not hinder the rhythmic flow of the music. Miss Gerhardt is self-dependent for interpretation; that characteristic, as noted above, was shown in her treatment of her first song. She is guided now simply by her own instincts and experiences. Every good singer does most of the things enumerated above. They are not the monopoly of Miss Gerhardt. But it is not given to every artist to blend all this technique and insight into an exquisitely moulded unity, and to add a magnetism so charming and compelling. Highly skilful and sympathetic piano-forte accompaniment is an obvious essential. In this she has often enjoyed the co-operation of Arthur Nikisch, whenever they have been able to meet on their travels. Miss Hegner has also been much associated with her as accompanist, and Miss Gerhardt speaks very warmly of her skill and fine perception.

The width and breadth of Miss Gerhardt's repertory have already been alluded to. Schubert attracts her greatly, but all forms of the art-song as exemplified by Schumann, Brahms, Hugo Wolf, and others of the immortals in song, receive sympathetic attention. Of the most recent composers, Miss Gerhardt speaks warmly of Erich Wolff, and his early death last summer while on tour in the United States is a source of grief to her. She thinks some of his songs are of the finest that have been written in modern times. In Germany she has found that his compositions are deeply appreciated. Miss Gerhardt speaks English with fair fluency; it is gratifying to learn from her that she likes singing in English, and that she considers it a singable language.

Among the innumerable appreciations that her singing has elicited there is none more valued than the following, which was addressed last year to Mr. Daniel Mayer, Miss Gerhardt's London agent:

I am very happy to hear from Miss Gerhardt that you are now arranging her American tour.

I am so glad to hear this, and I can assure you that Miss Gerhardt is the world's greatest Lieder singer, and will be one of the most colossal successes that America has had the privilege of participating in. I know that the Americans, highly musical as they are, will be astounded with her extraordinary art.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Miss Gerhardt made her first appearance in London on June 11, 1906, when she sang an air from Goetz's 'Taming of the Shrew,' and Liszt's 'Die drei Zigeuner' and 'Mignon.' Two days later (June 13) she gave her first London recital, the programme of which was as follows:

Miss Gerhardt travels a great deal, and has sung in many cities of the world. But nowhere is she more warmly welcomed or more keenly appreciated than in Great Britain. We are glad to hear that she will be in London again this spring.

There are thousands of young amateur and professional students in London alone yearning and learning to sing songs. We wonder how often more than a small proportion of these learners attend a vocal recital by a heaven-born singer, and so, for a trifling expenditure (less than is paid for an ordinary private lesson), gain the vision of a new path, and a superb ideal of technique and its application to interpretation.

ARNOLD SCHÖNBERG'S GURRE-LIEDER.

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

In another couple of weeks we shall have an opportunity of hearing again at Queen's Hall the 'Five Orchestral Pieces' of Schönberg* that caused such bewilderment at their first performance. Shall we be able this time to make any more of them than we did then? I shall always remember that occasion as the only one in my life on which I have been utterly baffled by unfamiliar music,—not merely left with the impression that some of it was bad music, but with the doubt as to whether it was music at all. People who were not there for that historic half-hour, but who have tried to make something of the 'Three Clavier Pieces' and failed, will have a faint idea of how the audience felt. But writing after the performance of the 'Five Orchestral Pieces,' and with some knowledge of other things of Schönberg, I ventured to say that he was a much better composer than you might think from his music. No one can play through the six songs of Op. 8, for example, without feeling that Schönberg is a real musician, with something of his own to say. If any doubt of this still lingers, it will hardly, I think, survive a careful study of the Gurre-Lieder. These were written as long ago as 1900, when Schönberg was about twenty-six years of age. I can well believe him when he says that at that time none of his friends had a good word to say for them. Their boldness and originality make them, in parts, anything but easy reading to-day, even to a musician familiar with all the most complex developments of modern music. The first part of the work was given at a concert of the Vienna 'Verein für Kunst und Kultur' in January, 1910, but merely with a pianoforte accompaniment. The complete work had its first orchestral performance in March, 1913; and both the voice-and-pianoforte and orchestral scores are now available.*

At the concert of 1910 to which I have referred, there were given, in addition to the Gurre-Lieder, Schönberg's 'Fifteen Songs' to words by Stefan George, and his 'Three Clavier Pieces' (Op. 11), both of which latter works were composed in 1908. The programme book contained the following remarks by Schönberg himself:

'The Gurre-Lieder were written at the beginning of 1900, the George Lieder and the Clavier Pieces in 1908. The years between perhaps justify the great diversity of style that these exhibit. The production of such heterogeneous works at the same concert also perhaps requires some justification, as it is done with deliberate purpose. In the Gurre-Lieder I succeeded for the first time in approaching an ideal of form and of expression that had hovered before me for years. Till then I had lacked the strength and certainty to realise this ideal. But now that I have at last entered upon this path, I am conscious of having broken through all the barriers of a bygone æsthetic; and if I strive towards a goal that appears to me certain, I am nevertheless conscious already of the opposition that I shall have to overcome—the vehemence and the resistance that even the pettiest temperaments will oppose; and I anticipate that even those who have so far believed in me will not be willing to comprehend the necessity of this development. It seemed to me, therefore, fitting to show, by a performance of the Gurre-Lieder—which eight years ago found no friends, but that have many to-day—that it is not lack of invention, or of technical attainment, or of knowledge of any other of the pretensions of the current æsthetic, that have forced me into my new path, but that I am following the inner compulsion that is stronger than education—that I am obeying a law that is natural to me, and therefore stronger than my artistic training.'

I do not propose now to write a descriptive or technical analysis of the Gurre-Lieder, but merely to express an opinion upon their artistic worth. The work is a setting of some verses by the Danish poet Jens Peter Jacobsen, which have been translated into German by Robert Franz Arnold. The poem deals with the love of King Waldemar for the beautiful Tove, and her death at the height of her love-rapture. The setting is for two tenor voices (Waldemar, and Klaus the Fool), a soprano (Tove), a mezzo-soprano (the Wood Dove), a bass (a Peasant), a 'Speaker,' a male-voice choir (Waldemar's Vassals), a mixed choir, and a large orchestra of strings, augmented wood-wind, ten horns, seven trumpets, and other brass and percussion in proportion. The work falls into three parts, but is otherwise continuous in form.

* 'Five Orchestral Pieces,' Op. 16; (1) Sehr rasch, (2) Mässige viertel, (3) Mässige viertel, (4) Sehr rasch, (5) Bewegte Achtel. These will be performed by the Queen's Hall Orchestra at Queen's Hall on the afternoon of January 17, under the direction of the composer.

I have not timed its duration, but the vocal score runs to nearly 240 large pages.

One's first feelings after a thorough study of the score are regret that this work should have remained in manuscript for thirteen years, and amazement that it should have been written by a young man of twenty-six. Its general idiom, even to-day, is more advanced than that of any contemporary German music; yet it was written three years before the 'Symphonia Domestica,' and six years before 'Salome.' It is quite evident, then, that Schönberg's style is one wholly native to him. It could not have been developed, say, out of Strauss or any other composer of our time, for there is simply nothing in Strauss out of which Schönberg's rich harmonic language could have been evolved. (It largely derives, no doubt, in the last resort, from 'Tristan,' as most of our modern music does; but it has come out of 'Tristan' by growth, not by imitation.) The style and the utterance of the Gurre-Lieder are absolutely individual, without taking any abrupt departure from the main stream of German music,—another proof that the originality that really matters is not simply an affair of the repetition of one or two new harmonic formulæ, or of a whole-tone or any other scale, but of the free and powerful winging of a personal vision through an air and over a territory that are in the main familiar to all of us. The Gurre-Lieder are original for our day just in the way that 'Tristan' was original for the 'sixties and 'seventies,—not by the conscious plastering of new clichés,—how soon they become old clichés!—upon the outside of the musical tissue, but by the spontaneous branching and flowering of this tissue into ever new and richer forms in obedience to the creative force of a mind that works unconsciously, out of the abundance of its own seminal vitality.

As Schönberg's name is at present a byword among us for calculated and meaningless cacophony, it is important to insist upon the absolute sanity and sincerity of the mind that is revealed to us in the Gurre-Lieder. The idiom of the work varies naturally in accordance with the nature of the subject at the moment. At times it is of transparent simplicity, as in the following passage from the love-duet:

So tan - zen die En - gel vor Got - tes Thron nicht,
 Ex. 1. Moderato.

wie die Welt nun tanzt.. vor mir.

and polyphonically richer as the situation demands. The expressive range of Schönberg's harmony is wider than that of any other German composer of our time. Now and then the harmonic progressions strike us as a little odd, but the impression is as a rule only momentary. Those of my readers who can recall their first boyish experience of 'Tristan' will remember how more than one passage,—the modulation at 'Todgeweihtes Haupt,' for example—had to be repeated again and again before the abruptness of the harmonic change lost its aggressiveness and came to seem not only normal but inevitable. So with many hundreds of Schönberg's harmonies in the Gurre-Lieder. Some people will no doubt feel a slight twinge at the progressions marked * in the following passage:

Ex. 2. Nicht sehn-li-cher möchten die See - len gewinnen den Weg zu der Se - li - gen Bund.

but in a very little while the harmony becomes perfectly lucid and logical; and they will have the same experience with certain harmonic progressions that are still more unusual. It will soon be felt that they grow quite naturally out of the mood or the situation of the moment, and that not a note of them has been put in for mere eccentricity's sake. Schönberg's mind is essentially a polyphonic one. Here again the comparison with Wagner is unavoidable. The polyphony of the Gurre-Lieder, like that of 'Tristan' and the 'Meistersinger,' is neither a vain bookish exercise nor a deliberate complication of melodic lines for the sake of their look upon paper, but the spontaneous speech of a mind so rich in ideas and so perfect in technique that it thinks as naturally in five or six dimensions as the ordinary mind does in one or two. Here is the theme typical of Tove's love:

Ex. 3. Slowly.

In the orchestral postlude to her song we have it combined with an augmented version of itself (the latter in the violins and wood-wind, the original theme in the violas and 'cellos), while No. 1 will be seen in the upper part of the bass clef in the third bar of the quotation (in the horns and cor anglais: it is impossible, by the way, to make the full polyphony clear in a pianoforte score):

Ex. 4.

In the following quotation the Tove theme is brought in in the clarinets (in the second bar) as a counterpoint to a new vocal melody, the 'cellos imitating it in the third bar:

Ex. 5. Moderato.
Mit Tove's Stim - me flü - stert der Wald

In the next example the Tove motive is again made the subject of some free imitations, and at the same time combined (in bars 3, &c.) with the Waldemar theme quoted as No. 1:

Ex. 6.

In these and a hundred other cases that might be cited, there is never a suspicion of self-conscious artifice: it is the emotion that gives birth to the polyphony, and takes it up again into its own being. Such temporary harmonic harshnesses as occur are only the result of the clashing of notes as they go on their several polyphonic ways; and in Schönberg's music, as in that of the older contrapuntists, we have only to listen polyphonically instead of harmonically,—horizontally instead of vertically,—for the progressions to justify themselves. Even where the writing is ostensibly harmonic rather than contrapuntal, as in the passage I have quoted as Example No. 2, each of the parts has an independent life. None of them is overlord: they are free members of a republican community, willing to co-operate but scorning compulsion. When we learn to listen to Schönberg in this way, many of the harmonic terrors even of his later works are put to flight.

My own feeling is that in the Gurre-Lieder we have the finest musical love-poem since 'Tristan.' In Waldemar and Tove, Schönberg has added another pair to the shining company of Paolo and Francesca, and Romeo and Juliet, and Tristan and Isolde,—another immortal couple aureoled with love and death. He lifts them up to such tragic heights not only by the beauty of the burning music he gives them to sing, and to the orchestra to sing with and round them, but by the atmosphere he creates about them. The lament of the Wood Dove after the death of Tove is inexpressibly moving and haunting. There is a strange ironic pathos in the music of the Fool, and again in the outcry of the bereaved Waldemar against his Creator; while the gradual ascent of the final scene into its lucent apotheosis is splendidly managed. I will not say that the music of these 240 pages is always on the same high level: that would be expecting too much. But I say confidently that here is some of the very finest music of our generation, the work of a brain that is capable both of jewelled detail and of a mighty span of conception. It will surely make friends for Schönberg wherever it is known.* It will have the further effect of making sincere students approach the later Schönberg with greater care. After this revelation of the deeply-feeling poet and the consummate master of musical speech that there is in him, it will not do to dismiss summarily the incomprehensible Schönberg of to-day as a charlatan, a poseur, or a lunatic. He is entitled to be heard with respect when he assures us, as he always has done, that he does not write a bar that he does not honestly feel. It is inevitable that a brain that at twenty-six could think so far ahead of the ordinary music of its own day should develop a baffling complexity at forty. Has that development been a normal one,—one that will justify itself to us in time,—or has the too nervous brain run on so fast and spread itself out so widely that it has lost its bearings? I admit that I for one cannot answer this question. Perhaps a study of the now accessible score of the 'Five Orchestral Pieces' may help us. But one thing is certain,—that we should greet Schönberg on his visit to us in a few weeks' time with the respect due to a great and sincere artist.

* It is the very work for one of the larger English Festivals: but the poem would have to be translated into English by a veritable poet.

FRIEDRICH RUST, HIS EDITORS AND HIS CRITICS.

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

Until quite recently, Friedrich Wilhelm Rust (1739-1796) was hardly to be numbered among the composers for whose works the musical world evinced genuine interest. And for a long time after his death, little remained of him but his name.

For instance, Schillings's 'Universal Lexicon der Tonkunst' (to which one may pretty confidently refer for information as to the state of things and of opinions towards 1840), after giving a short biography of him and conceding that he was to be remembered as a good performer on several instruments, gives very perfunctorily and without a word of comment a list of his principal works, thus: Sonatas, Variations, Concertos, Odes, Songs, &c.

Things did not begin to change until after 1888, when the composer's grandson, Dr. Wilhelm Rust (1822-1892—Cantor at the Thomasschule), started republishing his principal works. At the Doctor's death, fourteen of Friedrich Wilhelm Rust's sonatas had been edited (and edited with a vengeance) and republished, and the autograph manuscripts of these and of the remaining works were bequeathed to the Royal Library of Berlin.

Now begins the amusing part of the story, which is best introduced by quoting a few paragraphs from Dr. Rust's flaming prefaces to his editions.

Dr. Rust's claim is that his grandfather deserves to be acknowledged as one of the giants of musical art, as a precursor whose powerful genius had anticipated, in the matters of form and of style, many of the most wonderful innovations of the 19th century, and more especially Beethoven's. With reference, for instance, to the Sonata in C, he writes:

'Here we have, in all likelihood, the first specimen of the principle of Variation being applied to the creation of a great work, complex in its unity . . . The introductory recitative itself, which rings like a call of despair, is a variation, leading up to the following theme, an earnest, heartfelt prayer. The same method is used in the second section, which consists of three variations. Remembering the nocturnal procession in Lenau's "Faust," we yield to the impressions that the composer has brought back from Italy. Austere pilgrims pass before us; a pageant of pious children follows. It is as if the spirit of Mozart's "Requiem" was singing with them "Voca mecum benedictis." . . . In the Epilogue, the art of variation transfigures a prayer into a triumphal march.'

And the Sonata prompts the editor to remark:

'Here music rises to the height of a contest between Titans; we acknowledge the heroic victor by the reminiscences of motives which are engraved on his shield.'

Elsewhere he writes:

'Here the fancy of the style, now free, now severe, takes its flight and reaches heights almost never touched at that period. The idiom in its brilliancy, the poetic ideas in their profound pregnancy, burst forth under the influence of egregious events in the life of the composer. Goethe had come to Dessau, where Rust lived. Is it conceivable that he should have not played this peerless work before the great poet?'

The music of the Sonatas seemed to warrant, at least in a measure, the Doctor's vindications, being at times, in style and harmonization, utterly unlike anything done during the same period, and far ahead in the very direction followed by musical art since then. So, naturally enough, a number of musicians readily endorsed, albeit cum grano salis, the Doctor's statements, and admitted Friedrich Wilhelm Rust among the aristocracy of great composers and great originators. They could hardly have done less for the long-neglected prophet of romanticism, the man whose bold creative imagination had, unaided and isolated, foreseen and almost mastered the spirit and the technique that crop up later, by degrees, in the achievements of Beethoven, Schubert, Weber, and Mendelssohn: for such the Sonatas, in their edited form, showed him to have been.

Doubts, however, arose before long. The first to give a warning was Dr. E. Prieger, who, in a pamphlet entitled 'F. W. Rust, ein Vorgänger Beethoven's,' diplomatically informs us that 'while the grandson, full of enthusiasm, threw his whole soul into the creations of his ancestor, he gave a reflection of the pictures that had been vividly forming in his mind.' 'The additions,' he adds, 'concern the exterior only, and do not affect the fundamental character of the works.'

'This statement,' Mr. John Shedlock remarks in his excellent book, 'The Pianoforte Sonata,' 'is to a certain extent satisfactory; and we receive it thankfully. But why, one may ask, did not the editor indicate the additions in smaller notes? Then it would have been possible to see exactly what the elder Rust had written, and what the younger one had added. At present we can only marvel at some of the writing, and long to know how much of it really belongs to the composer. There are moments in which it is really difficult to believe that the music belongs to a pre-Beethoven period' (pp. 153-155).

All expounders, however, did not display as great an amount of caution and discrimination. And among those who proved the most eager to render full justice to Friedrich Wilhelm, we find no less an individuality than M. Vincent d'Indy.

'Rust,' says this celebrated composer and theorist, in the second book of his 'Treatise of Composition,' 'is the connecting link between Haydn and Mozart on the one hand, Beethoven on the other. In style, methods, and invention, his music borders closely upon Beethoven's. Now serious, now genial, at times romantic after the very fashion of the 19th century artists, he often delights us, and astonishes us when we come to think of the time at which he wrote. . . . One must consider him as the necessary vinculum between the tradition of Bach and the master of Bonn's novatory imagination.'

'In the works edited by his grandson appear a few reprehensible attempts at modernisation according to a practice of which Germany seems to enjoy the monopoly. However (we have evidence for it) these alterations do not amount to a real travesty: in Rust's Sonatas the chaste, pithy style is truly the author's.'

A long section of the chapter on 'the Sonata before Beethoven' is devoted to the study of Rust's works, which are analysed so as to show, with lengthy quotations, Rust's innovations in the matters of form and of style. The Sonata in C especially is upheld, in accordance with Dr. Rust's assertions, as an instance of the very principle of the modern 'cyclic' Sonata—in M. d'Indy's opinion, the climax of the art of musical architecture.

From that time, Rust's music found many partisans in France, especially among M. Vincent d'Indy's followers, and became a current feature of the concerts given at the Schola Cantorum.

A new stage was not reached until the end of 1912, when Dr. Ernest Neufeldt, president of a 'Rust-Gesellschaft,' having bethought himself of examining Rust's manuscripts with the hope of discovering more masterpieces, gave the startling results of his investigations in the German periodical, Die Musik.

The Sonatas published by Dr. Rust, he told us, have very little in common with the grandfather's original output. All the feats of daring harmonization and novel architecture upon which the 18th century Rust's new-fangled glory rested, belonged to the 19th century Rust. The clever, intricate variations, the 'thematic unity' of the Sonata in C, its 'recitative,' its suggestions of pageants, its triumphal march, were additions to the original text, which consists of 286 bars in all, whereas the Sonata as published in 1891 comprises no fewer than 500.

Likewise, the 'Titanic contest,' the 'reminiscences engraved upon the hero's shield' are not Friedrich Wilhelm's, but Dr. Wilhelm's.

'Now that the true facts are known,' Dr. Neufeldt concluded, 'Rust the giant returns into nothingness; and the true Rust, an interesting, graceful, shrewd, and sensitive artist shall endure, our sympathy for him resting on more normal and firmer foundations.'

To this very moderate article M. Vincent d'Indy retorted by taking up the cudgels in favour of the 'precursor' theory, and boldly abiding by his former statements. Dr. Neufeldt, he said ('S.I.M.', April, 1913), was a 'merry humbug,' who talked on subjects which he either misunderstood or had not sufficiently studied. He was incapable of detecting, under the surface, the originality and intrinsic beauty of Rust's music.* 'It is a great good,' he wrote, 'that those admirable works should at last be purged from the tinsel frippery in which they had been clumsily accoutred. Should one, because the unimportant polyphonic garb has ceased to exist, remain blind to the music, the admirable music, of F. W. Rust?'

M. Vincent d'Indy ended by saying that he was about to publish Rust's Sonatas in their true form, and then all musicians would be able to judge between his theory and Dr. Neufeldt's.

Until the time when this new edition will be available, many will probably think that Dr. Neufeldt's statements and quotations are fairly convincing. In his treatise, M. Vincent d'Indy obviously founds his assertions as to the merits of Rust upon the texts that Dr. Neufeldt gives us as garbled, and which (unless we admit that Dr. Neufeldt has deliberately misrepresented facts) differ from the originals by far more than by the 'unimportant polyphonic garb.'

The better to understand M. Vincent d'Indy's views on that point, one should remember his general views in respect of musical, and especially of melodic, style, which are somewhat austere. For instance, talking in the same treatise (p. 454) of Chopin, he remarks that certain of that composer's motives, 'when deprived of their ornaments,' are very poor, and that their merit consists in their 'form' far more than in their 'substance.'

This quotation (but the passage alluded to deserves to be read in whole) throws light on the spirit of his statements respecting Rust. But even then, it remains difficult to agree with him as to the unimportance of Dr. Rust's 'ornamentation.' He concedes, it is true, that two out of the fourteen republished Sonatas have been completely deformed: those in A and in D minor. Whence we are to suppose that the addition of 214 bars to a Sonata originally comprising 286 did not 'completely deform it,' but merely clad it in 'unimportant polyphonic garb.'

On the previous page we have quoted from Dr. Neufeldt's article in the 'S.I.M.' for December, 1913, the two versions of one of the Sonatas which M. d'Indy does not consider as 'completely deformed.' Rust wrote the first line; his editor the remainder.

About a score of no less typical examples, taken from the Sonata in B, and from others, are given in that and in the former article.

In short, the whole of Dr. Rust's doings has resulted in one of the most striking hoaxes to be found in the whole history of musical erudition. It stands to reason that if compositions 'doctored' to that extent may appear to so well-known a judge as M. Vincent d'Indy as 'far superior to Mozart's Sonatas' ('S.I.M.', April, 1913, page 50); if a Sonata, carried by spurious additions almost to twice its original length, may be given by him as an instance of firm and beautiful architecture ('Treatise of Composition,' pages 228-230); then may we all, critics and scholiasts, grieve. For such facts show how precarious are our standards, and how easy it is for us to go astray.

In the following number I shall attempt to draw from this little story, from the point of view of the critical judgment in general, a few of its natural consequences. And as soon as M. Vincent d'Indy's edition of Rust's Sonatas shall have appeared, a paragraph will be devoted to any new light it may throw on the subject.

THE CHILDHOOD OF THE WHOLE-TONE SCALE.

BY H. C. COLLES.

One of the departments of musical technique which most exercises the minds of theorists and the ingenuity of composers at present is the serviceableness or otherwise of melodies and harmonies constructed upon a basis of whole tones. The dual nature of the problem—their use in succession for purposes of melody and their use in conglomeration for purposes of harmony—has not been always sufficiently distinguished, possibly because those who have examined the case have drawn their evidence too exclusively from compositions of the present day in which the two are almost inextricably entangled, shall have formed a judgment in accordance with that evidence.

It may be worth while to record here some earlier uses of the whole-toned device, be it melodic or harmonic, with the object of bringing wider evidence to the notice of the judges. I do not mean to propound the question of the small boy in Punch who, when he discovered that whipping was a family institution, asked in offended tones, 'Who began this thing?' The beginning is not likely to be found, and perhaps does not matter very much, while the examination of certain experimental instances may lead to instructive results.

Sir Charles Stanford has recorded the fact ('Musical Composition,' p. 18) that 'Wagner, in the opening of the Third Act of "Tristan" (bars 6 to 10) experimented with the whole-tone scale and drew his pen through it, as was to be expected from a composer whose every work proves the writer to have had the pure scale inbred in him.' The instance, as the quotation suggests, is given in support of an argument condemning the whole-tone scale on the ground that a scale dividing the octave into six equal parts contravenes the laws of just intonation. The first instance which I wish to quote here occurs in a work written some thirty years before 'Tristan,' and by a composer who was certainly far less sensitive to the question of just intonation than was Wagner. Towards the end of Berlioz's first orchestral work, the Overture 'Les Francs Juges,' the following curious-looking passage occurs once only, leading up to the final tutti which forms the conventional triumphant ending:

EX. 1.

EX. 1. Musical score for five instruments: Oboe & Clarinet, Flute, Violin I & II, Viola, and Cello. The music is in 4/4 time, key of B-flat major. It features a chromatically ascending diminished seventh scale in the lower strings and woodwinds, with dynamics p, cres., and f.

It deserves close examination. Harmonically, it is perfectly simple; it represents nothing more than a series of chromatically ascending diminished sevenths, a very old and very cheap way of creating a sensation of growing excitement:

EX. 2. Musical score for a single staff, showing a chromatically ascending diminished seventh scale, marked with p and &c.

Melodically such a passage goes for nothing. Melody is, in fact, in abeyance for the moment, while excitement is worked up for a last outburst. But the series of whole-tone descents in oboe, clarinet, viola, and violoncello parts appears incidentally, and arises from Berlioz's intense pre-occupation with the problem of orchestral colour. In the early stages of his career he was not very sensitive to qualities of melody and harmony. He has told in his autobiography how he went to consult a player at the Opéra about the unison passage for brass instruments at the beginning of this overture, and how as he walked home dreaming of its grand effect he slipped and sprained his ankle, adding, with a delightful smile at his own expense, that in later years to hear that passage always gave him a pain in his ankle. 'Perhaps,' he continued, 'it gives other people a pain in their heads.'

The case before us is another and more subtle experiment in instrumental colour. He wanted to get the shot effect of the upper wind and lower strings crossing the strands of tone of the lower wind (bassoons) and upper strings (violins), and this implied descending whole-tones against ascending semitones. It is a clear instance of the needs of orchestration producing a fresh element in design. That Berlioz attached no particular importance to it is shown by its isolation. He did not develop the whole-tone scale either here or elsewhere. It merely arrived in the course of working out his problem of colour.

Similarly, Schubert used the whole-tone scale a year or two after Berlioz, but as was in accordance with his nature he did so in the course of working out a problem—not of colour, but of form. There is of course no conscious connection between them. Schubert did not so much as know of the existence of the young Frenchman who was feverishly grasping at new possibilities for the orchestra in Paris, while he wrote his great Symphony in C major at Vienna. No doubt many people have listened to the first movement of that Symphony without suspecting the presence of the whole-tone scale. For my part, I must confess to its having escaped me until my attention was drawn to it recently by Dr. W. H. Hadow. It occurs in the development of bar 2 of the opening theme (marked a):

EX. 3.

EX. 3. Musical score for a single staff, showing a whole-tone scale passage, marked with a and a.

At about the middle of the movement the rhythm of bar 2 is being extended by the trombones, the lower strings are quoting from the rhythm of the second subject, while the violins introduce the whole-tone scale brought into existence by the peculiarities of the modulation. The wood-wind parts are omitted from the following quotation because they add nothing to melody or harmony though they emphasise the original rhythm of the bar marked a:

EX. 4.

TROMBONI.

VIOL.

VIOL. CELLI. BASSI.

The trombone makes clear the simple logic of the harmonic scheme. It consists of three perfect cadences into the keys of A flat minor, E minor, and C minor, and the design of the harmony is further impressed by the fact that the two violins make their whole-tone descents alternately, binding the harmonies together by suspensions. The irresistible logic of the harmony, together with the comparatively slow rate of movement, prevent the average hearer from realising that a complete descent of the octave is made through whole-tones. One accepts the harmonic progressions before one appreciates the melodic outline. Whatever may be said of the difficulty or impossibility of playing Berlioz's example of just intonation, there can be none with regard to Schubert's, because his whole-tone scale, a purely melodic one, is perfectly squared with principles of diatonic harmony, involving only one easily apprehended enharmonic change.

I pass now to a case, a little later in musical history, which may possibly have been directly suggested by Berlioz, though whether it was or not is of no importance, the case of the whole-tone scale, still a descending one, in Glinka's opera 'Ruslan and Ludmila,' produced in 1842. Here the scale occurs also melodically, not as an incident either in orchestral colour or in thematic development, but as a separate entity. Glinka uses it as a direct piece of dramatic characterization; it is, in fact, the Leitmotiv connected with the wicked magician, Tchernomor. It is so independent that in the opera it generally appears unharmonized, or, with no more than the barest sketch of harmony, thus:

EX. 5.

It is clearly intended to suggest something sinister and distorted, and the suggestion will be equally strong whether the players succeed in playing it as a scale of equal tones dividing the octave into six parts, or as a scale of mixed major and minor tones with one diminished third in it. As a fuller indication of the harmonies by which Glinka accompanied it mentally, its use in the Overture to the opera may be quoted. The theme treated imitatively by trumpet, violin, and wood-wind is the principal theme of the Overture, a happy Weber-like tune across which the magician's unlovely scale strikes harshly:

Ex. 6.

Tromba. Vi. Wood.
Celli, Bassi.
Tromboni, Fag.

Glinka, like Schubert, so far from founding any harmonic scheme upon the scale of whole-tones, takes particular care in the Overture to explain it by diatonic and enharmonic modulations. But Glinka's harmony is devised to fit the melodic scale; Schubert's scale appeared in the course of developing his harmony. The fact that Glinka's scale is in the bass instead of in the treble also tends to make the harmonic progressions more crude, and, as we have seen, crudity is a part of the dramatic intention. The point to be noticed is that with Glinka the thing passes from being an incidental, one might almost say accidental, appearance into an intentional melodic device, a first consideration. It marks, therefore, a distinct stage in the career of the whole-tone scale.

A direct link is provided between this and the next, which will be our last instance. Octave Fouque, a French writer whose book 'Les Révolutionnaires de la Musique' was published in 1882, touched upon what were then recent developments in Russian music, and remarked on the fact that Dargomijsky had used in his opera, 'The Stone Guest,' a descent of basses in tones without semitones, and added that one would admire it very much if one had not already seen the scale of 'Tchernomor in Glinka's 'Ruslan.' He suggested in fact that Dargomijsky allowed himself to 'crib' direct from Glinka. In one sense this is true: the same device is used to illustrate the same kind of dramatic situation.

'The Stone Guest' is a version of the 'Don Juan' story most familiar to us in Mozart's opera, and a comparison of Dargomijsky with Mozart's last scene in 'Don Giovanni' is very interesting. Where Mozart uses diatonic scales over chromatic harmony Dargomijsky uses whole-tone scales, and begins to feel his way towards whole-tone harmony. It was natural that Fouque, without the experiences of modern French and Russian music to guide him, should miss the differences between Glinka's and Dargomijsky's use of the device. With Dargomijsky it is not merely a scale but a melody based upon a scale and developed very considerably. It begins thus:

Ex. 7.

To trace this theme through its subsequent changes and extensions is to realise how the melodic development began to induce a whole-tone harmonization. Its next appearance emphasises a $\frac{4}{4}$ chord—that is to say, a major third plus a whole-tone:

Ex. 8.

Next we find the melody doubled in thirds in the bass and accompanied by a tremolo consisting of the major third and the minor seventh, two notes of the dominant seventh contained in the scale of whole-tones. The melody involves as passing-notes other conglomerations of whole-tones, and the passage is finished with the well-established 'French sixth' resolving on to a triad:

Ex. 9.

When the melody is extended downwards the augmented triad (another chord of whole-tones) comes into play:

Ex. 10.

and a sequential treatment of it results in a still more pronounced assertion of this chord, which is obviously one of the bases of a system of harmony by whole-tones:

Ex. 11.

Without attempting to follow Dargomijsky through all the evolution of his idea, I must quote a passage from the orchestral peroration of the scene, reminding the reader that Dargomijsky died in 1869, leaving this opera to be scored by Rimsky-Korsakov:

EX. 12.

By this point he has got so used to the successions of whole-tones implying a logical sequence of their own, that incidental dissonances involved do not matter very much to him, provided that through them he reaches a point of consonance sooner or later. It is only necessary to place this passage beside the one from Glinka's Overture to realise how far Dargomijsky has outstepped his model, and when we place it beside a typical passage from Debussy we see that Dargomijsky's point of view is much nearer to his than to Glinka's. Such a passage as the famous Golaud theme from 'Pelléas et Mélisande':

EX. 13.

shows, however, that melody and harmony have changed places, that harmony is now the cause and melody the effect, whereas the reverse was the case in the earlier history which we have been tracing. That change introduces a far more sophisticated stage in the progression by whole-tones, and effectively puts an end to its comparatively innocent childhood.

Occasional Notes.

THE ART OF NOISE. 'S.I.M.' for December contains an amusing article by M. Ecorcheville on 'Le futurisme ou le bruit dans la musique.' We all know the impatient Futurism that seeks to cut away the past rather than to build upon it. It seems to be at large in Italy, where the reigning grievance is that 'Italy has not a single original musical genius to set beside Debussy, Dukas, Charpentier, Richard Strauss, Edward Elgar, &c.' These words are taken from a manifesto issued in 1911 by one Stradella, who finds it easier to condemn what exists than to suggest what should stand in its place. M. Ecorcheville proceeds to quote a further manifesto by Russolo which has the decided virtue of constructiveness. From a long argument we cull the following:

Let us pass through a great modern capital, more attentive with our ears than with our eyes. An ever-changing pleasure will gratify our sensibilities as we distinguish the gurglings of water, air, and gas in the metal pipes, the snorting and growling of the motors, breathing with their indescribable suggestion of animal being, the pulsation of pistons, the screeching of mechanical saws, the noisy bumping of trams on their rails, the cracking of whips, the flapping of flags. We will find amusement in imagining the ideal orchestration of the swinging doors of the shops, the buzzing of the crowds, the varied hullabaloo of railway stations, forges, spinning works, printing works, electric generating stations, and underground railways. We want to take control of this variety of sounds, and to bring it into harmonic and rhythmic order. . . .

Russolo and his co-thinkers do not stop short at theory. We are given to understand that a concert took place on August 11 at Milan with an orchestra composed as follows (no English equivalents that we can imagine give half the effect of the French terms):

3 bourdonneurs	2 gloulouteurs
2 éclateurs	1 fracasseur
1 tonneur	1 stridenteur
3 siffleurs	1 renâcleur
2 bruisseurs

'S. I. M.' reproduces a photograph of the room in the futurist laboratory at Milan where these instruments are stocked. They look like super-gramophones. The programme consisted of four morceaux:

The awakening of the Capital.
A gathering of motors and aeroplanes.
Dinner on the Casino terrace.
Skirmish at the oasis.

M. Ecorcheville proceeds to a long and interesting commentary. He tries to make out a case for the art of noise; but whether in earnest or not, readers of the article may judge.

A performance of Sir Edward 'THE APOSTLES' Elgar's Oratorio, 'The Apostles,' AT CANTERBURY. has been arranged to take place, on festival scale, in the Nave of Canterbury Cathedral on June 19.

The choir will be that of the Leeds Choral Union (conductor, Dr. Henry Coward), consisting of about 250 voices. The New Symphony Orchestra is engaged, and Sir Edward Elgar will be the conductor. Miss Muriel Foster has also been engaged, and arrangements are being made with other eminent singers. Admission will be by ticket, and the proceeds are to be devoted to the fund for the restoration of the Cathedral. A special organ will have to be erected. Dr. Charlton Palmer, the Cathedral organist, is in charge of the arrangements.

Rosenthal, the well-known dealer BACH AND of Munich, offers for sale two WAGNER autographs of much interest. One, AUTOGRAPHS. which he prices at 32,000 marks (shillings), is the Nageli copy of Bach's 'Wohltemperiertes Klavier.' It is mostly (not quite all) in Bach's handwriting. Though unknown to Kroll when he edited the 'Forty-Eight' for the Bach-Gesellschaft, it was known to Spitta, who described it in his work (English edition II. 665). He considered it Emanuel Bach's copy. It contains the final improvements, notably in Fugues Nos. 18 and 22. Another Bach-autograph, which Rosenthal prices at 6,000 marks, is the continuo part of Cantata No. 7, 'Christ unser Herr zum Jordan kam.' This was given away by A. E. Müller, Cantor at Leipsic, 1804-10, who wrought grievous havoc with the Bachiana there. Wagner's first attempt at operatic writing was 'Die Hochzeit,' on an unpleasant though dramatic story. He finished the libretto, and afterwards destroyed it as his sister disapproved of the story. But the introduction, a chorus, and septet were already composed. Wagner presented the MS. (thirty-six pages) to the Choral Society of Würzburg, where he was then living. The Society was dissolved, and the MS. sold; it was afterwards in London in the possession of Mrs. Burrell. Rosenthal now offers it for 20,000 marks. An unpublished sketch of a Symphony, in E major, composed in Wagner's Magdeburg time, is also offered, at 5,000 marks. We suppose it is not likely that these manuscripts will find a home in England.

CHARTER TO THE A significant movement is on foot GUILDHALL to obtain the grant of a Royal SCHOOL Charter to the Guildhall School of OF MUSIC? Music. At a banquet given on December 12 by Mr. Gilbert L. Wild, as chairman of the Music Committee of the City Corporation, Mr. Harry Bird, the late chairman, referred to the possibility of a successful issue of the movement. The realisation of this honour would give to the School a status worthy of the new prestige it has won during recent years; moreover, the great relief in rating expenses would further open up the possibilities of the work of the School.

Elgar's tone-poem, 'Falstaff,' which was brought out at Leeds on October 2, 1913, has been performed nine times. Helsingfors, Moscow, Vienna, and New York are responsible for four performances. The second Symphony of the same composer has been performed twenty-seven times in this country and abroad. The latest we know of is the performance announced to be given at Rome on January 25. Has any other recent symphonic work of any composer of any nationality been performed so often?

In the Yorkshire Weekly Post, a correspondent recalls an appearance of a Halifax choir before Queen Victoria in 1859, and he states that Mrs. Sunderland (a then well-known singer) sang 'O bid ye faithful aerial fly' (presumably an up-to-date composer's freak title for Linley's 'O bid your faithful Ariel fly') and 'I cannot mind my wheel, mother.' Both titles were neatly prophetic of modern locomotion.

The title-page and index of Vol. 54 (January to December, 1913) of the Musical Times are now ready, and can be had post-free by subscribers on application to the publishers.

NOTES ON FACTS AND THEORIES RELATING TO JEWISH MUSIC.

BY ARTHUR M. FRIEDLÄNDER.

The design of this article is first to show the historical connection of Neums with the ancient Hebrew signs for musical inflection, and, secondly, the derivation of melodies used by the early Christian Church from the older music used in the Synagogue.

NEUMS AND HEBREW SIGNS.

During my student days at the Royal College of Music I attended the Historical lectures given by Sir Hubert Parry. At one of these (1888) he introduced the subject of the Neums.

Owing to the similarity of some of these signs to those used in Jewish worship, I became so deeply interested in the matter that I took it up as a special study. After devoting considerable time to collecting material and to research, I am now able to put forth some of the results of my labour, and hope at a future date to deal with the whole subject of Jewish music more fully.

Neums are defined in Stainer and Barrett's 'Dictionary of Musical Terms' as:

The musical notation employed from the 8th or 9th to the 12th century. Their origin is doubtful; Kiesewetter considers them to be the ancient nota Romana, others believe them to have been of Asiatic origin.

On Hebrew music Dr. Burney says: 'Neither the Ancient Jews nor the modern have ever had characters peculiar to music; so that the melodies used in their religious ceremonies have at all times been traditional and at the mercy of the singers. The Canonico Calvaca is, however, of opinion that the points of the Hebrew language were at first musical characters: and the conjecture has been confirmed by a learned Jew whom I have consulted on that subject, who says, that the points still serve two purposes: in reading the Prophets they merely mark accentuation, but, in singing them, they regulate the melody not only as to long and short, but high and low notes.'

So much for Burney. He is quite in error in the description he gives concerning the 'points.' The points serve as vowel sounds, nothing more and nothing less. For the purposes of accentuation and regulating the melody various and quite different signs are used.

Wickes, in his 'Treatise on the Hebrew accentuation,' (18—), says: 'The notation which fixed the traditional punctuation of each word may well have been introduced at the same period and for the same reasons as the notation which fixed the traditional modulation. From the testimony of the Talmud we are able to trace the practice of such a system to the first centuries of the Christian era, and it may have been much older. Thus the statements on the subject in Megilla 32a and Nedarim 37b are given in the names of Rabbis Jochanan and Rab (who lived towards the middle of the 3rd century), and that in Berakhoth 62a on Rabbi Akiba's authority (which brings us close to the beginning of the 2nd century). Besides these, which may be regarded as historical notices, we have the tradition (Megilla 3a) that the system was in use even in Ezra's time. Nor is this tradition (as it seems to me) to be altogether rejected. It requires only to be rightly interpreted. The method of musical recitation may well have been one of the institutions established under the second Temple, and soon after Ezra's time, for the more formal and solemn conduct of public worship; originally introduced by the Sopherim, Ezra's immediate successors, as a kind of sêyog latôrâh—distinguishing the public reading of the Law.'

The earliest known existing Hebrew manuscripts containing accents are of the 9th century. One is in the library at St. Petersburg, and another, of somewhat later date, can be seen in the Illuminated Manuscripts Department of the British Museum. Here attention must be drawn to the fact that vowel points and accents are not permitted to be written in the Scrolls of the Law used in Divine Worship. They are however employed when the Pentateuch is printed in book form; and so with other Books of the Bible. Hence, one who reads in the Synagogue from the Scrolls of the Law, has to commit to memory the cantillation of every word; but when reading from the Prophets one reads from the printed book, which contains also the printed accents.

It is customary for a lad when he reaches the age of thirteen years and one day to be 'called' to the reading of the Law, to be 'confirmed' (or made Bar-Mitzvah*). On this occasion he reads a portion of the Law in the course of the Sabbath service, with the cantillation. It may be well to state that the practice which generally obtained till recent years in teaching the musical rendering of the accents was that known as 'teaching by ear.' I well remember in my youth I was taught the signs from their being written on a slate, and I learned the various tunes by 'ear.' This may be useful as illustrating the traditional method of handing down from time to time the method of cantillation.

One can readily believe that before the signs were written, movements with the finger could illustrate what was required in the matter of high or low notes, turns, and other purely musical details. It is important to bear in mind that each musical sign has a name, and to this name are sung the different notes conveyed by the sign, just as in modern music it would be represented by doh, re, mi, &c. Again, each sign has a meaning, and this meaning may go a long way to show what the musical interpretation should be.

The following illustration from Zechariah ii., shows how the Hebrew accents are used, viz., under and over the words:

רָנִי וְשִׂמְחֵה בַת־צִיּוֹן כִּי הִנְנִי־בָנָה וְשִׁכְנֵתִי בְתוֹכָךְ 14
נֶאֱמְרָהּ: וְנָלוּ גוֹיִם רַבִּים אֶל־יְהוָה בַּיּוֹם הַהוּא 15

Here the Neums are placed only above the words:

Libe ram do mine de morte eter na lndio
Na x emen da quando c'e li mo uen do sunt ter ra

The above, which comes from a work of the 11th century, has been copied from Coussemaker's admirable 'History of Harmony in the Middle Ages.'

Note the similarity between the Hebrew accents given below and Neums on page 23.

NEUMS.

From Grove's Dictionary, first edition. By permission.)

Of the most important accents a few may be enumerated here :

'Silluk' and 'Sôf posuk,' which are indifferently used for the final accent of the verse. The former, which means 'cessation,' 'close,' i.e., of the melody, is the name of the stroke placed under the tone-syllable of the word. The latter term indicates properly the two points (or small strokes) which separate the verses from each other.

'Esnachto,' signifying 'a causing to rest.'

'Shalshêles' = chain. The sign (which was supposed to represent a hanging chain) and the name both point to the melody which is described as a double trill with its chain of notes ; or as two notes connected by an ascending chain of sounds.

'Zarko,' derived from the word 'zorak,' to sprinkle, scatter. It may be taken to refer to the character of the melody, which is further symbolized by the form of the accent. The form would then represent what is called in music 'a turn.'

Above I referred to the system of using the fingers or the hand, which was known as Cheironomy. From the Talmud we also learn that a system of teaching by the hand was used for instructing the reading of the Law. Thus in the above reference to Berakoth 62a, Rabbi Akiba and Rabbi Nachman Son of Isaac say : 'The hand was used for the purpose of leading and showing the meaning of the text,' Wickes also points out, perhaps Jesus made use of it when reading from the Prophet Isaiah (see Luke iv. 17 ff.). I venture to suggest in connection therewith that Guido d'Arezzo knew of this system, hence his 'Guidonian Hand.' In this connection it is worth referring to the theory that Guido was of Jewish descent. Musical history deals not a little with the monks, and possibly many were converts from Judaism. Botteschein (a monk), said to be of Jewish descent, gave the music of the accents used in chanting from the Pentateuch to Reuchlin, in whose Grammar (1513) is found the earliest known printed musical interpretation of the signs. Moreover, it is most interesting to find they are written in four parts : Descantus, Altus, Tenore, and Bassus, though in the Synagogue they are sung without harmony. This arrangement in Reuchlin, however, should go to prove how beautiful they were held to be. I have taken the subjoined specimens from a copy of the work (which is very scarce) kindly lent to me by Mr. Elkan N. Adler. But in the original copy the music is printed with the old lozenge-shaped notes and read from right to left, to coincide with the Hebrew text which I have transliterated into the vernacular. A few bars are shown in four-part harmony, and the melody only of the remainder :

So far having shown the great antiquity of this Hebrew musical notation, I will now state my views—which, so far as I know, are entirely original—upon the connection of the music known as 'Plain Chant' with some of the oldest known Jewish music. At the outset I am struck with the similarity existing between the Hebrew word 'Nē'imo' and the Greek 'Neuma,' from which we get 'Neum.' The root of the Hebrew word is 'Nôam,' meaning pleasant, and 'Neimo' is used in connection with the reading of the Scriptures. The signs are called 'Ta'amim' and 'Nēginôs.' The former expression is used for syntactical purposes, the latter for musical utterance. The word Neum is used to denote a musical sign! Surely this affords matter for serious consideration!

It may be well to state here that in the above reference to Megilla 32a we find that Rabbi Jochanan says: 'Anybody who reads the Scriptures without "Nē'imo" [this is a Hebrew word = pleasantness, i.e., accentuation], and learns the Mishna without "Zimro" [= song], to such a person the text in Ezekiel, chap. xx., v. 25 refers.' Joma 38a says about Hogras, a Levite, 'He joined in song with sweetness.'

THE SOURCE OF EARLY CHRISTIAN MUSIC.

What was the source of the earliest Christian music? My theory is that the converts from Judaism handed down the traditional modes of the cantillation of the Holy Law and Prophets (not, as has been erroneously supposed, the chants for the Psalms), but in a somewhat corrupted form, subsequently adopting this for the music known as Plain Chant.

It has been urged that Jewish music has been influenced by that of the country in which the congregations using it lived; but I am strongly of opinion that though in some cases the tonality may have differed, in others it has never altered. It is not likely that the Jews would have employed music other than their own for chanting the Scriptures. It must be remembered that they were forbidden to do as other nations did.

The following well-known verses from Psalm cxxxvii., vv. 3-5, support this view:

For there they that carried us away captive required of us a song: and they that wasted us required of us mirth, saying, Sing us one of the songs of Zion.

How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?

If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning.

My attention has been drawn by the Editor to some correspondence that appeared in this journal as far back as 1872. As there is some matter contained therein which has some bearing on the subject of the present article, the following extracts will be interesting.

FREDERIC ARCHER, LONDON, JAN. 16, 1872.

... There is very little doubt, however, that the chant ought simply to be described as recitative, both on account of its nature and origin. If we refer to the history of the Church, we find that the earliest known Christian chants were those known as the Tones Ambrosian, and there is strong reason for supposing that these, although founded on the Greek 'modes,' are of Hebrew origin, many Jews having sought refuge at Antioch in those remote days. These were afterwards adopted by the Western Church, having been remodelled by Pope Gregory, and from them the modern Anglican chant is derived. The 'Antiphons' used at the commencement and close of each Psalm during Vespers in the Romish Church, bear undoubted evidence of a Hebrew source, as they are almost identical with the 'musical accents' called 'Parah,' 'Karne,' &c., still sung before and after each verse of a Psalm by the Spanish and German Jews, many of which can be proved by traditional records to be the same melodies as were originally used in the Temple. In some of these, a kind of reversed recitative is observable, as many as 14 or 15 notes in ad libitum tempo being sometimes apportioned to one syllable; but the Gregorian chants proper are really recitative . . .

Unfortunately the above writer, amongst others who have written on this subject, is, as I have already pointed out, quite in error when alluding to the chanting of the Psalms by the Jews. Of course we sing the Psalms, but we do not know the musical interpretation of the musical signs used in the Book of Psalms. I am treating of the music known for the cantillation of the Holy Law and Prophets.

Rabbi Francis L. Cohen also contributed to the Musical Times of August, 1889, an article on 'Song in the Synagogue,' which should be read in this connection, though he approaches the subject from a different standpoint. I am also acquainted with the lectures he gave at the Jewish Historical Exhibition, 1888, and before the Musical Association, 1903. I strongly differ from some of the views he sets forth in his paper (1888). He says:

The sole musical influence that the European Jews could possibly have responded to would have been that of the people. Now European folk-music was first of all the spontaneous song of the illiterate people who knew nothing of Greek theories, but aimed at satisfying the natural ear, which they seem from an early period to have done by using the natural system of tonality on which our modern scales are founded. Thus the Jewish melodies of Northern Europe must evidently be perfectly original, and derived from the Oriental home of the Israelite. No Hebrews could have preserved either the ancient Templar style, or the melodies built upon it, if the system adopted by the Catholic Church had really exhibited such ancient Israelitish paternity as is claimed for it. Nor could the Jewish music, in employing similar scales to those afterwards known as Ambrosian and Gregorian, have been influenced by the Church tones, because quite apart from the possession of similar tonality by the more ancient scriptural cantillation, we know very well that the most famous of the early arrangers and supporters of the Catholic psalmody and hymnody were merciless foes of the Jews. The famous Ambrose, bishop of Milan in the 4th century, distinguished himself by his intemperate harshness against the Synagogue no less than by his arrangement of the Christian service of song. We can scarcely imagine that he, or others, would have consented to 'Judaize' the Church music or that the Jews would have imitated the tones used in the worship of men who destroyed their homes and burnt their synagogues under the plea of religion.

Notwithstanding the foregoing opinions, I venture to suggest that as the Psalms of David were adopted, surely there could not have been any prejudice against the use of 'Jewish music.' In support of my views I cite the following passages from Rev. D. A. de Sola's treatise on 'The Ancient Melodies of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews' (1857):

It is almost certain that the Levitical choirs, consisting of some thousands of individuals, who, by virtue of their office, cultivated and occupied themselves with music, subsisted till the destruction of the Temple, and that music was further perfected and cultivated during the long interval between the time of Ezra and that event. Philo Judæus mentions with praise the melodies of a Jewish sect, called the Therapeutics, in the fiftieth year of the Christian era; and many instances are cited in the New Testament of the general cultivation of music among the Jews of the period. Matthew xxvi., 30; Mark xiv., 26; Eph. v., 19, Col. iii., 16. It has also been clearly proved that the chants of the early Christians were derived from the Temple melodies, and were adopted by them from the Jews. The reasoning of G. B. Martini is to any impartial reader conclusive on this subject. He says ('Storia della Musica,' vol. i., p. 351):

'This is the Hebrew chant of the Psalmodies which, ever since the time of David and Solomon, have been transmitted from one generation to another, and [therefore] goes beyond the first half of the first age of the Church. These have not materially varied, but have been substantially preserved by the Hebrew nation. Is it not, then, sufficient to convince us, that the Apostles who were born Hebrews, brought up in the customs of their nation, who frequented the Temple and engaged in the prayers and divine praises therein recited, should retain the same method and use the same chants with which the people used to respond to the Levitical choir?

We may remark, in addition, that it is quite improbable that the early Christians should have adopted melodies used by idolaters for the purposes of idolatry. Not only was this prohibited to them by the teachers (see Forkel's 'Geschichte der Musik,' vol. ii., p. 91), but they were themselves naturally averse to adopt them. Thus Clement of Alexandria, who flourished in the 3rd century, would allow the guitar and lyre to be used at social festivities 'because David played on them,' but prohibited the flute because that instrument 'was used in the service of idolatry.' They therefore could not use any others than the old Hebrew melodies with which they were acquainted from early habit and association.

Futhermore, the following extracts from the article on 'The Gregorian Tones,' in Grove's Dictionary, will also be of interest as bearing on this idea. Mr. Rockstro says:

The Gregorian Psalm-tones are beyond all controversy the oldest melodies now known to be in existence. So great is their antiquity, that no one has ever yet succeeded with any degree of certainty in tracing them to their original source. Three only of the numerous theories proposed seem to rest upon any reasonable basis—those, namely, which pretend to trace the so-called Gregorian melodies to a Greek, an early Christian, or a Hebrew origin. On one point only are all authorities agreed. No doubt exists as to the historical fact that the Psalm-tones were sung by the primitive Christians, and through them handed down by oral tradition alone, until through the efforts of St. Ambrose in the 4th century and St. Gregory in the 6th, they were collected, classified, and reduced to rule and order, in a form which, protected by ecclesiastical authority, has remained in uninterrupted use in the Church to the present day. This fact admitted, the question arises, Whence did the primitive Christians obtain the venerable melodies they have handed down to us?

The objections to the suggestion that they invented them are very strong indeed. The Church was too much shaken by persecution, during the first three centuries of its existence, to afford its members an opportunity for the introduction of new Art-forms into services which were of necessity conducted with the utmost possible secrecy and caution. There is abundant evidence to prove that the Psalms were sung in the Catacombs; but none whatever to show that those who sang them composed the music to which they were adapted. Still more extravagantly improbable is the popular and widely-spread theory that the early Christians derived their music from the Greeks. If the Psalm-tones really came from Greece they must have been used in the worship of Dionysos or some other deity equally obnoxious both to the Christians and the Jews. Is it possible to believe that men who were content to suffer martyrdom rather than utter a single word which would be construed into toleration for heathen superstitions, would have consented to sing the Psalms to heathen melodies? Moreover, though the Ecclesiastical Modes have been universally named, since the time of Boëthius, after those of the Greek system, they are so far from corresponding with them, that it would be impossible to accommodate them to the tonality demanded by the Pythagorean section of the Canon. If, therefore, they are really of Greek origin, their constitution must have been changed beyond all possibility of recognition—a supposition quite untenable. There remains the theory that Psalm-tones were brought to Rome by the primitive Christian converts, after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. And here, it must be confessed, the probabilities lie entirely on the side of the theorists. What more natural than that the persecuted refugees should have sung the Psalms, in the Catacombs, to the melodies to which they had sung them in the Temple—the melodies to which, beyond all doubt, the inspired words had originally been set.

It remains now for me to show the discovery I have made in finding the strong similarity existing between the Jewish mode of cantillation for the Prophets and the oldest-known music of the Catholic and Protestant Churches. The whole system of this cantillation is very beautiful, and must certainly impress the hearer. It differs to a great extent from that used for chanting the Pentateuch, and certainly is of a more plaintive character. What should prove of great importance are the cadences, the half- and whole-phrase and conclusion of a portion. In chanting the Pentateuch the half-phrase and whole-phrase are illustrated thus:

es - nach - to . . .

Sóf posuk  = whole phrase.
sóf po - suk.

Sóf posuk  = end of a portion.
sóf po - suk. . .

For chanting the Prophets:

Esnachto  = half-phrase.
es - nach - to

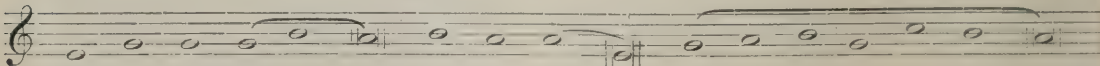

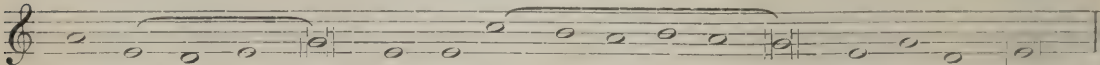

Sóf posuk  = whole phrase.
sóf po - suk.

Sóf posuk  = end of a portion.
sóf . . po - suk. . .

The above musical illustrations are those used at the present day by the Ashkenazic Jews. Baer says: 'The Portuguese [Sephardic Jews] are younger than the Polish and German altogether.' It is important to mention here that there are other modes for the cantillation of the portion from the Pentateuch read on the New Year and Day of Atonement, and also for the Book of Esther and Lamentations of Jeremiah.

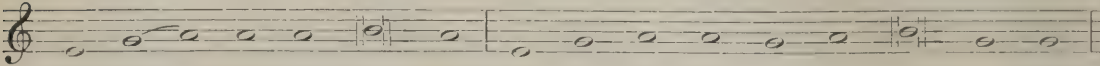

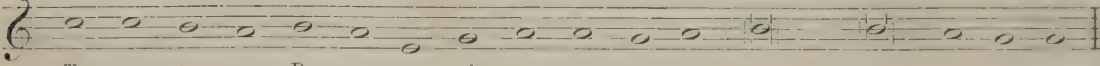

I find the similarity to which I have just alluded existing between this latter mode of cantillation and the so-called Ambrosian 'Te Deum,' which I have also copied from Grove's Dictionary of Music and for the purpose of illustrating my point.

I select the following from Zechariah ii., 10, with this particular mode of cantillation. Note the similarity existing between this and the Te Deum as under:

Sing and re - joice, O daughter of Zion: for lo,

 Ro - ni v'sim - chi bas - tsi - yón ki
 I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the Lord.

 hinnèni vo v'sho - chan - ti nê - um adô - noi.

TE DEUM LAUDAMUS

From the 'Dodecachordon' of Glareanus (Basiliae, 1547).

Te De - - um lau - da - mus, Te Do - mi - num con - fi - te - - mur.

 Te ae - ter - num Pa - trem om - nis ter - ra ve - ne - - ra - - tur.

The description of this melody given in 'Grove' states :

The antient Melody—popularly known as the 'Ambrosian Te Deum'—is a very beautiful one, and undoubtedly of great antiquity ; though it cannot possibly be so old as the Hymn itself, nor can it lay claim whatever to the title by which it is popularly designated, since it is written in the Mixed Phrygian Mode, i.e., in Modes III. and IV. combined ; an extended scale of very much later date than that used by St. Ambrose. Numerous versions of this venerable melody are extant, all bearing more or less clear traces of derivation from a common original which appears to be hopelessly lost. Whether or not this original was in the pure Mode III. it is impossible to say with certainty, but the older versions furnish internal evidence enough to lead to a strong conviction that this was the case, though we possess none that can be referred to the age of St. Ambrose, or within two centuries of it.

In conclusion, having previously given sufficient grounds to prove the antiquity of the Hebrew cantillation, with the many powerful arguments of eminent authorities which strongly support it, I venture to suggest that in considering the aforementioned remark referring to the derivation of the melody of the Te Deum 'from a common original which appears to be hopelessly lost,' I have been able to show without a doubt whence it has been derived.

Church and Organ Music.

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

BY HARVEY GRACE.

IV.—OF CHOIRBOYS.

Probably in no part of his work has the organist the benefit of so much good counsel as in the training of choirboys. There are many excellent books on the subject, and from time to time these are supplemented by lectures and magazine articles. Yet curiously enough no one can pay a visit to a dozen churches chosen at random, without being convinced by the painful evidence of his ears that the well-trained boy choir—that peculiarly English institution—is the exception rather than the rule. It is not so much a matter of locality or material. There are churches where the cost of the choir runs into four figures, at which the boys habitually carry the chest register too high, or sing with such a defined break that responses and chanting—especially Plainsong—would appear to a blindfolded hearer to be the work of a different set of boys from those singing the anthem. On the other hand there are churches in slum districts where the boys' voices are a delight to the ear. The reverse case is the rule of course, but there are enough of these exceptions to prove that the matter is one of skill in training rather than in choice of material. Between these two extremes are many churches where the training of the voices has been merely superficial. How is this, when so many excellent manuals on the subject have appeared ?

Probably one reason is that these books are written by choirmasters in high places, where good natural voices are always forthcoming, and where there are facilities for frequent practice—in a word, everything on the material side that a wealthy congregation or liberal endowment can provide. The writers too often seem to be under the impression that other choirs will be more or less similarly well equipped. For example, from several of these text-books I learn that the boys should stand in such an order, with music desks of a certain height, so that they may have their hands free ; that for accompaniment a pianoforte should be used,—preferably a grand, in order that the player may have an uninterrupted view of the class ; that corporal punishment should be rarely applied ; that choirboys should never be allowed to shout at their games ; that great care should be taken in choosing their diet, all harmful and indigestible foods being avoided ; that they should never be allowed to eat nuts ; that, &c., &c. With these dicta no one is likely to disagree, but for one organist in the fortunate position of being able to carry them into practice, there are probably ninety-nine to whom most of them are necessarily a dead letter.

On the musical side, these manuals provide many pages of exercises ranging from the homely scale to the trill, and from the Anglican chant to the florid aria,—again all excellent, but of practical use in only a small minority of cases.

There are hundreds of organists who might say to the authors of their treatises : 'Your book is interesting reading, but when I tell you the circumstances under which my work is done, you will see how little the book can do for me. My salary is small—£50 a year—so that I have to work hard at teaching to make a living. Most of my pupils want their lessons in the evening, therefore boys' practices—which must of course take place after their school hours—cannot be more than three per week. Even if I could afford the time, the boys are paid such small amounts that one could not reasonably demand any more of them in addition to their full practice and services. As to type of boy, I cannot pick and choose. The better class boys of the parish go to secondary schools, and have so many home-lessons that few of them care to undertake the ties of choir work as well. I do not get, as you lucky big-wigs do, "sons of gentlemen," many of whom have already received instruction preparatory to a trial of voice. If a boy in my neighbourhood has a musical home, and is discovered to be the possessor of a particularly promising voice, he is not for me. He goes—I am not blaming him—to a wealthy church where there is a choir school and other advantages, or to a cathedral. I have no practice-room, with nicely-appointed music library, desks, and pianoforte. My practices are held in a stuffy vestry, or in a corner of the church, with an asthmatic harmonium for accompaniment. You suggest that corporal punishment should be used only in extreme cases. I have been at St. Praxed's for many years now, and have never once used corporal punishment—not because I haven't wanted to, or because I have any humanitarian prejudice against it, but for the far better reason that it would soon bring my choir to an end,—to say nothing of the extreme probability of my finding myself in the dock answering a charge of assault. You must remember that your boys get a quid pro quo for their work, and both they and their parents are anxious for them to be where they are. My boys, so far from receiving a quid pro quo, receive at the most only half-a-one per quarter. Boys swayed by considerations of filthy lucre give my choir a wide berth, and earn more selling papers or running errands. Those that come, do so because they are fond of singing, or because their parents are members of the congregation. As to their diet, I have no supervision except during practice and service times. As far as possible, I see that the food then consumed is of a light, nutritious quality, such as sweets, and the smaller and more easily negotiable forms of fruit. I find the boys willing to eschew nuts, especially the Brazilian variety, as the difficulties of silently cracking them, and tidily disposing of the shells, are well-nigh insuperable. At St. Praxed's, therefore, they are used mainly as missiles. I have not yet ventured to visit the playgrounds of the half-dozen Council schools from which my boys are drawn, to protest against their shouting at their games. I doubt if my visit would be welcomed, or even allowed, by the education authorities. As for the admirable exercises you provide, I find that with the not too bright type of boy at my disposal, all my practice time is required for the service music—for you must remember that my boys leave school at fourteen, and go to work at once, and the cases in which they are of any use to me afterwards—owing to difficulties of attending practice—are few. Therefore I have constantly to be slaving away with young ones.

This is, I believe, a fair statement of the conditions under which many choirmasters have to do their work. The result too often is that, finding himself unable to carry out more than a very few of the recommendations of the books on choir-training, he sooner or later gives up the attempt, and allows himself to be mastered by his circumstances. The sight of dozens of pages of exercises gives him the quite erroneous impression that nothing can be done in the direction of voice-training without the expenditure of a great deal of time—more at all events than he can spare.

As a matter of fact, however, the responsiveness of the human voice to training is such that, while years of arduous work are required to produce the great singer, a pleasant vocal quality may be obtained by an amount of study so limited as to be negligible in the case of any other instrument. This applies with special force to boys' voices, except where they are handicapped by years of wrong methods.

For experienced choirmasters, or for those so fortunate as to be able to obtain a steady supply of good material, with ample facilities for practice, this article is not written. To these, it is—or should be—even as a carrying of coals to Newcastle. It is hoped, however, that a few simple hints from one who has had twenty years of boy-training under most—sometimes all—of the disadvantages mentioned above, may be of use to others similarly situated. It is of course impossible in the limits of a magazine article to do more than suggest lines of work. Amplifications and developments will, however, readily suggest themselves. The organist must dismiss from his mind the idea that he cannot find time in his few boys' practices for voice-training. He must bear in mind that in this, as in other branches of teaching, it matters less what is done, or the time occupied, than how it is done. In vocal, as in physical training, we know that a few simple exercises, carefully and thoughtfully used, produce better results than elaborate ones merely 'gone through,'—these latter, indeed, so far from doing any good, are often actually harmful. So we get our first encouragement in finding that very little time is involved. Five minutes is such a modest slice of a practice to devote to this purpose that surely no choirmaster will say he cannot spare it. Let us say, then, that the minimum should be five minutes, and the maximum fifteen.

The scale and arpeggio will of course form the basis of our work. The value of the single-note exercise should not, however, be overlooked. It may always be practised with advantage, though as a rule it comes first as the most elementary study. Used in the early stages with new boys, many useful developments of it will suggest themselves.

For example, when the boys are able to sustain a note with good tone for about ten beats at about $\text{♩} = 60$, they may monotone short sentences, especially some constructed with a view to overcoming any local peculiarities of speech, or they may count from one to ten, being first told that this particular exercise is a four-fold one, requiring management of breath, pure tone, sustaining of pitch, and good enunciation. They will take all the more trouble if they can be got to regard it as a time-saving exercise.

The scale is best practised downwards in the case of boys with rough voices. Commence at such a pitch that the use of the head register is natural, and let the descent be diminuendo. The pace should be slow at first, and need never be more than moderate. Usually the scale may be started at  rising by semitones to  The scales should be linked by a modulating chord, and a convenient arrangement will be to allow two beats between each scale, the boys being instructed to take a deep breath in the interval.

Instruction books usually give the dominant chord only, with or without a pause. The addition of the tonic during the rest gives the boys an opportunity of mentally singing the note before attacking it vocally. They should be instructed to do this from the first. By no other means can the true pitch of the keynote be guaranteed. Again, the provision of two beats' rest ensures ample time for deep breathing. The boys should stand easily, with the hands lightly resting on the lower ribs, and should breathe deeply enough for a slight movement of the ribs to be felt. Without some such arrangement as this, they will content themselves with their usual casual and insufficient breathing. While the descending scale is of special importance in extending the head register downwards and so smoothing over the break, it is well not to practise this form only. In the service music passages founded on the ascending scale will be quite as numerous as the reverse, and usually more difficult. They need more effort, and a nicer attention to pitch. Moreover, they offer a trap in the matter of forcing up the lower register. These passages can be prepared for only by careful practice of ascending scales. As to the vowel sounds to be used, of course all should have their turn, with a preference for ah and ee. The sound oo is too often regarded as the Alpha and Omega in training boys' voices, but as a matter of fact its virtues are negative rather than positive. It is invaluable in the early stages of training rough voices, inasmuch as it compels the use of the head register. Against this virtue is to be set the very serious drawback of its inducing a too backward production, and a tight throat. (The addition of the consonant k has claims in the matter of clean attack, but should be used with special care, as it has an even greater tendency to constrict the throat.) Moreover, unless great care is taken, oo means a bunched-up tongue, and lips pursed as if for whistling. The latter defect is of course easily cured, but the former gives great trouble, and is one of the most frequent causes of bad enunciation. Indeed, the exclusive practice of oo may be said to be specially successful in the production of songs without words. We have all heard of the choir at whose hands a well-known chorus was identifiable only by its familiar strains and by frequent shouts of 'Hoo-loo-loo-you!' Again, oo does little or nothing in the actual building-up of tone. Its too frequent use results in a colourless voice often developing in the later stages into a hollow hoot. The choirmaster with rough voices to deal with, however, must use this vowel sound liberally until the use of the head register has been carried down to its drawbacks in the matter of the tongue, throat, and lips. As soon as he can do so with safety, he should give the boys ascending scales to ah, watching carefully the production of the notes from

One sometimes hears of choirmasters recommending the elimination of the chest register. This is a mere shirking of a difficulty. There are hundreds of notes in a full Sunday's work which, under these conditions, are toneless and all but inaudible. No one ever suggests the non-use of a register in the case of any other voice. The lower notes of a boy's voice can be made quite pleasant and of fair power by careful practice of single notes from middle C to the A above, and by the use of soft downward scales from B on the 3rd line, rising by semitones to E. The vowels ah and aw should be used.

For brightening the tone and imparting 'ring' to the medium and high notes, the upper half of the scale will be found useful, sung to the vowels ah and e. Nasal resonance may be added by preceding the vowel by the sound N. The boys should softly sustain this nasal sound for a couple of beats, and should be told to aim at setting up a slight vibration at the back of the nose—a kind of tickling. The N should then lead into the vowel, thus :

giving way later to the practice of such words as :

This part of the training needs great watchfulness. Nasal resonance is an excellent thing in a voice, so long as it is not heard—a Hibernian way of putting it, that may be explained by the childish definition of salt as 'a kind of stuff that makes potatoes taste bad when you don't put any.'

For inducing forward production, simple exercises, with the vowels preceded by p, are useful. Such an exercise as :

will be found to have a brightening effect. Care should be taken to make as little as possible of the consonant. The boys will at first tightly press their lips together, and produce nothing much more than a series of explosions. They can easily be taught to let the lower jaw move freely on its hinge, and to make the contact of the lips light and of the shortest possible duration. As an extended exercise in this way, and one giving valuable practice in interval singing, take the following :

It may be started at A below the treble staff, and carried up by semitones to the D or E flat. All these exercises may be practised to ha, mezzo-staccato, with good results. They may be developed almost indefinitely, and to them should be added difficult phrases from the music in rehearsal at the time. An instructive ten or fifteen minutes may be spent in dealing with a few of these passages, letting them take the place of the ordinary scales, &c. The boys will be interested in exercises based on passages of this kind, and much time will be saved later on. As a general rule, exercises should be practised softly. Also, it is important that nothing should be allowed to distract the attention of the boys during this part of the practice. This recommendation seems too obvious to be set down, but as a matter of fact, it is a not uncommon custom to allow books to be distributed while exercises are being sung. Time may thus be saved, but labour is certainly lost. The practice of filling up an odd couple of minutes during the practice by the singing of exercises is also a mistake. A brief rest will do the boys good, while perfunctory singing to fill in a gap does more harm than good. The choirmaster should resist the frequent temptation to shirk the voice-training part of the practice. Apart from its intrinsic value, it is important in another way. It impresses upon a boy as nothing else can, the fact that the voice he uses at his games, in the street, or in the careless performance of school songs, is not good enough for Church use. The utmost skill and enthusiasm on the part of the choirmaster, however, go for little or nothing unless accompanied by the knack of managing boys. This brings us to such matters as organization and discipline, and to the consideration of the chorister not merely as a wind-instrument but as (in the words of the immortal Chadband) a 'soaring human boy.'

The new organ at Bishopsgate Institution was opened by Sir Frederick Bridge on November 21, in the presence of the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress. The organ is fitted with a carillon, which was effectively displayed in a Fantasia by Sir Frederick Bridge on 'Bowe Bells,' specially composed for the occasion.

The annual meeting of the Church Orchestral Society was held on November 21 at St. Peter's Mission House, Mr. Arthur Frere presiding. A satisfactory report was presented, and the following officers were elected: president, Sir Charles Stanford; secretary and treasurer, the Hon. Richard Strutt; hon. librarian, Mr. Richard Jones. A festival orchestral service in connection with the meeting was held at St. John's Church, Wilton Road.

Barnby's 'Rebekah' was performed after evening service at Holy Trinity Church, Lee, on November 23, the occasion being a Jubilee Festival. The soprano soloist was Miss Melrose. Mr. Ernest G. White conducted with ability and insight.

Handel's 'Dettingen' Te Deum was sung at the Halifax Place Chapel, Nottingham, on November 23. The solos were taken by Miss Emmie Warner, Madame Ethel Parkin, Mr. J. Franklin Pearson, and Mr. Harold Glover. Mr. E. M. Barber was the conductor, and Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson played the organ accompaniments, and, as the concluding voluntary, Handel's Concerto No. 2, in B flat. The Halifax Place Choir sang Part 1 and selections from Part 2 of 'Elijah,' under the direction of Mr. E. M. Barber, at the Shakespeare Street Church on December 11. The principal soloists were Miss Emmie Warner, Madame Ethel Parkin, Mr. J. Franklin Pearson, and Mr. Harold Glover. Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson was the organist.

A Festival of the united choirs connected with the Leyton-to-Loughton Free Church Council was held on November 27 at the Wesleyan Church, High Road, Leytonstone. A miscellaneous programme including part-songs and oratorio choruses was given under the direction of Mr. Hubert G. Welton, with Mr. T. H. Goodwin at the organ, and Mrs. Blazey at the pianoforte. The soloists were Madame E. Windsor Locke and Mr. Saunders Squires.

A meeting of the Bradford and District Association of organists and choirmasters, held on November 29, took the form of a Henry Smart celebration. A short paper was read by Mr. W. H. Tate, a selection of part-songs was given by the Blind Choir, conducted by Mr. Tate, an Anthem was sung, and Mr. W. H. Ibberson played organ works.

Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was sung by Chigwell Church Choir on Advent-Sunday, under the direction of Mr. Henry Riding. The Ladies' Choir and a contingent of the Loughton Choral Society assisted, and Mr. E. Cuthbert Nunn was the organist.

On December 7, Spohr's famous Oratorio 'The Last Judgment' was well performed at St. Bede's Church, Liverpool, under the direction of Mr. Ernest H. Smith, who presided at the organ. The solos, duet, and quartets were sung by Mrs. Whitney, Miss Sykes, Master McGeadins, and Messrs. Rollins, Slocombe, and Jackson.

Brahms's 'German Requiem' was performed at St. John's Church, Upper St. Leonards, on December 10, by the choir of the Church, assisted by the Musical Society and an orchestra of local players. Mr. Leonard O'Connor (the organist) conducted. Mr. T. S. Guyer, organist of Bexhill Parish Church, was at the organ. The soloists were Miss Florence Barrow and Mr. A. H. Crouch, a member of the choir.

At the Parish Church, Walton-on-the-Hill, Liverpool, Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was performed by the choir on December 10, in the place of the usual choral service. Mr. Albert Orton presided at the organ, and the solos were sung by members of the choir.

On December 10 the choir of Ealing Parish Church gave a creditable performance of Spohr's 'Last Judgment.' The soloists were Miss Gertrude Powell, Mr. Reakes, Mr. Butcher, and Mr. Ernest Costa. Both solo and choral work were excellent.

Handel's 'Messiah' was given at the Broomwood Wesleyan Church, Clapham Common, on December 10, by an augmented choir. The soloists were Miss Maud Wilby, Miss Wilhelmine Fink, Mr. Herbert Thompson, and Mr. Bertram Mills. Mr. Allan Brown presided at the organ, and Mr. G. Harold Paine was the conductor.

Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm was sung at the Baptist Tabernacle Church, Laygate, on December 14, under the able direction of Mr. John Ward. The soloist was Miss Herkes, and accompaniments were supplied by Miss Burdon (pianoforte) and Mr. Pennicook (organ).

LIVERPOOL CHURCH CHOIR ASSOCIATION.

The thirteenth annual Festival of this organization was successfully held in St. George's Hall on December 4, when a large assembly included the Lord Bishop, Dr. Chavasse, the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, Mr. Arthur Earle, President of the Association, with many representative citizens. The presence of Sir Hubert Parry as the Association's 'guest-conductor' added great distinction to the proceedings, and the famous composer received an unmistakably warm welcome. Under his vigorous and inspiring direction the final chorus from his Oratorio 'Judith,' 'Put off, O Jerusalem,' and noble anthem 'Hear My words, ye people,' were excellently sung by the great chorus of combined choirs from twenty churches. Sir Hubert was greatly impressed by the fine tone and responsiveness of the choristers.

Mendelssohn's 'Christus' was a first experiment in the performance of a complete work. It was steadily and effectively sung under Mr. Branscombe's direction, the tenor recitatives being given by Mr. G. R. Barnett, a local singer of high repute.

Another novelty at these Festivals was the introduction of a piece for men's voices. The festival music included Mr. Townshend Driffeld's melodious anthem 'The Lord is gracious,' in which the male altos were materially assisted by the female contraltos. The other choral item was the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C, composed by Mr. Samuel Lees, organist of Bebbington Parish Church, which Sir Hubert Parry, as adjudicator, had selected from the compositions sent in anonymously by local musicians. This tuneful work was effectively sung under Sir Hubert's direction. The city organist, Mr. H. F. Ellingford, presided at the organ, which was usefully supplemented by trumpets, trombones, and drums. The voluntaries included Dr. W. G. Alcock's new 'Marche Triomphale.'

Among the vocal principals were Master Percy Edgerton, Mr. J. C. Brien, of Liverpool Cathedral Choir, and Mr. Humphrey Bishop. There can be no doubt that this great annual effort has done much to improve the outlook and esprit de corps of local church choirs. It is a movement in which the unremitting labours of Mr. Ralph H. Baker, as business director of the Festival, are most usefully exerted.

Reviews.

The Office for the Holy Communion. In D major. By Edward C. Bairstow.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This Service is inscribed to the Leeds Parish Church Choir, and it may be said at once that full justice can be done to it only in places where choir, organ, and organist are alike good. Dr. Bairstow's music is a striking mixture of the ancient and the modern. It is modern in its freedom of texture and in its realisation of dramatic possibilities, but it has sufficient modal flavour to make the whole thoroughly ecclesiastical in style. Even when there is no actual trace of the ancient modes, the music is more often diatonic than chromatic.

There are several pages entirely free from accidentals, and many where they are scarce. So interesting, however, is the composer's material, and his treatment of it, that there is no feeling of monotony. There is, instead, a bracing and vigorous atmosphere not too common in modern Church music. The opening of the Creed will serve as a specimen of this combination of simplicity and freedom:

At the Resurrexit we have an effective use of the double choir, a fine ascending octave-passage on the Tuba being a feature of the accompaniment. The opening theme is liberally used throughout the Creed. Particularly effective is the augmented version on page 12, while on page 16 we find it in diminished form combined with the syncopated figure which first appears in the organ part on page 6. The series of chords with which the Creed ends gives us yet another version. Its most impressive use, however, is in the Sanctus, in which a derivative is used as an ostinato. We quote the opening bars:

The movement consists of twenty bars, the theme appearing in all but the last. As an example of the diatonic nature of the music, it may be pointed out that though the treatment of the ostinato is full of interest, there are only three accidentals throughout. The Benedictus is another striking proof that much may be done by skilful use of simple means. It is a piece of pure modal writing, with a theme that is either a fragment of Hebrew ritual music, or a good imitation thereof. A more emotional note is struck in the Agnus, which contains effective solos for treble, tenor, and bass. There are several references to the syncopated theme from the Creed, referred to above. The graceful ornamental figure in the organ part on pages 27 and 28 is from the same source. A like happy use of material is found in the Gloria. Note, for example, the quotation from the Kyrie at page 33, and on the same page the further use of the ornamental passage from the Agnus Dei, not dragged in, but in each case introduced with regard to the words. The ostinato figure from the Sanctus again impressively accompanies the choir at the words, 'For Thou only art holy,' sung pp, and leading up to a fine climax. The theme of the fugato passage on page 38 refers us again to the opening subject of the Creed, and the Service ends with this emphatic version of the same theme :

In a word, we have here a setting of the Holy Communion Office which, by virtue of its wholesome vigour, the interest and excellence of its musical content, and the skilful way in which the new is grafted on to the old, may be set down as one of the most notable of modern contributions to Church music.

Ballade ; Serenata ; Intermezzo. For violin and pianoforte.
By Jenő Hubay.

[Joseph Williams, Ltd.]

Intimacy with a particular instrument is often a danger to a composer, for by putting the more showy and easily-obtained effects at his fingers' ends it provides him with a very easy method of 'padding' his music. The case is very different when it helps him to adapt good musical ideas and musicianly skill to the style of the instrument. Thus Hubay's knowledge of the violin results in music that is interesting to the general listener as well as to the violinist. Such are the three examples named above, in an order of advancing difficulty. The Ballade, 'Was der mond erzählt,' is developed almost entirely from two or three plaintive melodies over a gentle arpeggio accompaniment, and stops just in time to avoid monotony. The 'Serenata' is adapted from the Scherzo form—G minor with a recurring but altered G major Trio section ; its restraint gives the greater effect to a moment of un-academic modulation and a later moment of decorative work. The Intermezzo has less value than the other pieces, as it often strains after elusive inspiration ; but it does not descend to flashy 'violinism.'

SONGS.

London Town. By Herbert W. Wareing.
The County Palatine. By A. Kingston-Stewart.
O Father, all-creating. By C. H. Lloyd.
Wishes ; The pathway through the poppies. By Bothwell Thomson.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

To say that Dr. Wareing's 'London Town' is a song that we would be both likely and glad to hear at a smoking concert is high praise, for the double qualification is rarely satisfied. If the singer is well applauded for it, as he is likely to be, and wishes to sustain the buoyancy it has created, he could do worse than to follow with Mr. A. Kingston-Stewart's 'The County Palatine,' whether or no there are Lancashire folk in the audience. Or if it be a 'Ladies' night' concert and he wishes to make a sentimental contrast he might choose Mr. Bothwell Thomson's 'The pathway through the poppies.' This is designed to stimulate but not to cloy the gentler emotions, and musically it proceeds with attractive smoothness. A medium voice is needed for each of the songs hitherto mentioned, but only a soprano or tenor could sing Mr. Thomson's 'Wishes'—a page or two of delicate and pretty nothings that would be sure to make their effect, especially if piquantly interpreted.

Dr. Lloyd's 'O Father, all-creating' is an essay in the style that the more discriminating of our parents loved when they were young. It has a flowing melody of considerable suave beauty, and a natural accompaniment. Here again a high voice is required. It would be an excellent song for a good choir-boy soloist.

Postludium Festivum. (Original Compositions for the Organ, No. 443.) By Charles W. Pearce.

Twelve Miniatures. (Original Compositions for the Organ (New series), No. 27.) By H. M. Higgs.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Dr. Pearce's Postludium is a remarkably bright and attractive piece of work. At the pace marked it is rather difficult, but there can be no doubt as to the results being worth the trouble. It appeared originally in the Organist's Quarterly Journal, and well deserves its revival in separate form.

In the 'Twelve Miniatures' of Mr. H. M. Higgs we have a collection of pieces combining in an unusual degree the qualities of simplicity and interest. The average length is a couple of pages, and the degree of difficulty is rather less than that of the 'Twelve Monologues' of Rheinberger. They are thus useful teaching material for the fairly advanced pupil. There is, however, nothing of the study about them, and while all may be used effectively as Voluntaries, a few, such as Nos. 4, 6, and 11, are worthy of inclusion in a recital programme, short and simple as they are.

FALSTAFF

SYMPHONIC-STUDY

IN C MINOR, WITH TWO INTERLUDES IN A MINOR

FOR FULL ORCHESTRA.

BY

EDWARD ELGAR

Op. 68.

MINIATURE SCORE,

PAPER, 7s. 6d.; CLOTH, 10s. 6d.

FULL SCORE AND ORCHESTRAL PARTS ON HIRE.

THE TIMES.

We get again the Elgar of the brilliant "Cockaigne" Overture, of the "Pomp and Circumstance" and "Coronation" Marches. There is an abundance of highly original orchestration, and the whole is moulded with a stronger hand than are these earlier and smaller works.

THE TELEGRAPH.

It is certainly the most elaborate of Elgar's works so far. . . . It is on every page the hand and the voice of Elgar, who speaks with no uncertainty; in a vein of quaint humour, as when Falstaff sleeps; of rare beauty and charm, as in the interludes; and even more in the exquisite closing scene of the fall and death of Falstaff. . . . Elgar has given us a masterpiece of music, prodigiously stamped with his own remarkable personality.

THE MORNING POST.

Sir Edward Elgar's music is a remarkable example of his powers presented in a light hitherto unknown. He frankly enters the field of programme music and does so with immediate success. . . . As a musical illustration of a Shakespeare character it is one of the most remarkable scores produced. . . . Apart from its fidelity to the particular aspect of Falstaff offered by the play it has great value as music, and that value is found in the fact that the composer reveals an expansion of style and a great quality of beauty and charm. . . . The work, very finely played under the composer's guidance, marks an advance in Sir Edward Elgar's art, and constitutes a valuable addition to Shakespeare music whose worth cannot fail to be recognised.

THE DAILY GRAPHIC.

The design of his Symphonic Study is masterly in its breadth and decision, and no elaboration of detail is permitted to obscure the main outline of the structure. It falls into four main divisions, broken by two interludes, which, while still forming a material part of the development, come as a welcome relief to what might otherwise prove too breathless, a rush of incident. . . . The opening section is a lax miracle of life and gaiety. We are in the midst of a wit combat of bewildering dexterity. The themes fly backward and forward like tennis balls across a net. So rapid is the repartee that one positively gasps for breath. . . . At the right moment comes the first interlude, in which the Knight is wafted in dreams back to boyhood and sees himself once more a slim page. The delicate charm of this passage defies description. . . . It must be said that Elgar has written a masterpiece which does equal honour to himself and to the land that bred him.

THE DAILY MAIL.

It is the work of a man arrived at consummate mastery of his means, who has contrived a speech that exactly expresses him. . . . The new "Falstaff" has an animation in its succession of scenes of tavern revelry, highway robbery and warfare, broken only by the two little interludes gracefully hinting at old dance movements, that cannot surely for long fail to exhilarate all hearers.

THE DAILY NEWS.

"Falstaff" shows us Elgar in a new light. Though his personality is still unmistakable, he has got nearer than ever before to the school of which Strauss is the chief representative. The themes are expressive and richly humorous and pathetic. . . . The whole work is full of wonderfully rich and novel orchestration and happy touches of musical psychology, and it is finely proportioned.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE.

The chief theme, in spite of its ponderous accents, is a little featureless, but another phrase representing the boasting side of his [Falstaff's] character is a capital one, of real humour, and cleverly treated by the composer. But the purely pictorial element is of rather stronger calibre than the psychology, and in the next section, where the revelries of Falstaff and the Prince are described, the music is extremely brilliant and brimming over with merriment, the orchestration having many deft touches of humour. . . . The orchestration of "Falstaff" deserves more than a word or two. Elgar has always had a wonderful command of instrumentation, especially in tone-colour, but in this latest work he has surpassed himself. Every instrument has a virtuoso part, and the brilliance and mastery of the writing, its amazing richness and variety in colour and effect, are remarkable.

EVENING NEWS.

"Falstaff" is a work of the utmost charm and interest and a notable achievement on the part of the composer. In one respect, its instrumentation, it is still more remarkable, for the orchestra is handled with a brilliance and mastery which few composers could equal.

THE MYSTIC TRUMPETER

POEM

BY

WALT WHITMAN.

SET TO MUSIC

FOR BARITONE SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

HAMILTON HARTY.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS.

TONIC SOL-FA, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

THE TIMES.

Mr. Harty's cantata, "The Mystic Trumpeter," has a directness which engages one's sympathy at once. The composer shows considerable skill in the management of simple effect, and behind the effect there is sincere feeling.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Harty's setting may find an honoured place in the repertory of many a provincial choral society. . . . It is in no wise difficult, considering the present state of choral technique, and the choruses are effective alike for singer and hearer. . . . He gives us moments of striking beauty, and often rises to a height of real poetry.

THE MORNING POST.

Mr. Hamilton Harty has treated his theme with much freshness and resource. He gives proof of his command of fancy and contrivance, yet he loses none of the charm that always distinguishes his music. The description of Paradise is of entrancing beauty, and the picture of the Crusaders lives in graphic tints. In dealing with the love section he is tender beyond imagination, and his climax of joy is spontaneous and unrestrained, giving the exact note the verse requires.

THE STANDARD.

Mr. Harty clothes all in harmonies that remove them from the commonplace. Never for a moment is he at a loss for an appropriate figure or phrase; indeed, it is his ready command of ways and means that is perhaps the most striking feature of the music. The work should find high favour with choral societies all over the kingdom.

THE DAILY MAIL.

"The Mystic Trumpeter" calls for a variety of picturesque illustrations, and this Mr. Hamilton Harty has supplied with the fulness of his facile and efficient talent. . . . The workmanship is extremely polished, and the composer seems always to hit the effect he is bent on.

THE DAILY NEWS.

The choral writing of "The Mystic Trumpeter" is such as Yorkshire loves, and the singers revelled in the broad phrases and strong harmonies. Mr. Harty's meaning is never in doubt. He has seized on the salient characteristics of each section with unerring instinct, and if he does not stop to consider the subtler shades of meaning, the poem is one which calls for broad treatment rather than ultra delicacy.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Mr. Harty has seized the musical possibilities of the text with great skill, and produced a series of inspiring mood-pictures with a refreshing youthfulness about them which is sure to make the work popular.

THE YORKSHIRE POST.

There is nothing tentative about Mr. Harty's score, every effect is assured, every passage sounds well. The appeal he makes is instantaneous, partly, no doubt, because the pictures presented by the poet are obvious enough to require no very great subtlety of treatment, but in a greater measure because of the transparent clearness of the effects. For this reason, and because of the genuine picturesque charm of the work, one is pretty certain that it will be taken up by not a few choral societies.

APPENDIX (Additional Songs).

Half-bound, Paper Sides, Gilt Top. Published as a Net Book. Price FIVE SHILLINGS net.

THE TIMES.

The plan of the book is exceedingly attractive. An essay on "The Boy Shakespeare," with illustrations, leads the way to the games which such songs as "Come unto these yellow sands," "Full fathom five," "It was a lover," and many others suggest. . . . The point which is most essential is that the choice of music is good of its kind, and the volume ought to be welcomed by all who are helping children to learn through their play.

THE MORNING POST.

Another book that is certain to be appreciated is found in "Songs from Shakespeare with Dances." . . . The literary matter referring to Shakespeare is made very interesting with its account of the customs, living, and furniture of the time when he was growing up to greatness. . . . The whole work is of the utmost value in making Shakespeare known in this country, where he is probably less understood than by any other nation.

THE QUEEN.

It is a handsome volume profusely illustrated, with many helpful directions as to the execution of the dances, besides information regarding the source of each song, date of the composer, &c. . . . We not only sympathise with the idea and its practical use, but heartily recommend the publication, the perusal of which affords endless delight.

THE WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

The authoress explains that her aim has been to place in the hands of capable teachers a really good collection of Shakespeare songs, with dances descriptive of the songs, set to music based upon the Shakespeare melodies, and this object seems to have been very happily attained.

THE BOOKSELLER.

The book aims at placing in the hands of capable teachers a really good selection of Shakespeare's songs, with descriptive dances set to music based upon Shakespeare melodies. This aim has been completely attained, and the book may be very confidently recommended to all who wish to find a new entertainment for schools and school children.

THE STAR.

Is a beautifully bound and printed volume.

THE BIRMINGHAM DAILY MAIL.

The whole volume is a treasure trove for children.

THE YORKSHIRE POST.

In these days of open-air pageants and pastoral plays, a volume of "Songs from the Plays of William Shakespeare, with Dances" will be found of great service. It is of more than historic value.

THE BRISTOL TIMES AND MIRROR.

A very delightful, helpful, useful, and instructive book in teaching and training of children and giving them joy in the life and songs of Shakespeare. . . . The publication is indeed a charming one.

THE LOOKER-ON.

This book is not only beautifully produced, but places in the hands of capable teachers a splendid selection of Shakespeare's songs, with dances descriptive of the songs, and set to music based on Shakespeare melodies. Such an arrangement of simultaneous Shakespeare dance and song has never been placed before the teaching public before, and we very heartily commend it.

YORKSHIRE POST.

The name of Dr. Walter G. Alcock is in itself a sufficient guarantee of the sound teaching of organ-playing, and his book, "The Organ," more than sustains his reputation. . . . There are many useful exercises on various technical points, and some short original pieces which serve as further illustrations of the author's teaching. It is very clearly printed on good, stout paper, and from every point of view is a desirable book.

THE SCOTSMAN.

The work is a distinctly useful addition to books of musical instruction.

THE BRISTOL TIMES AND MIRROR.

Although many books of instruction about the organ have been published, the latest is among the best. Its merits are sundry. . . .
If the book be thoroughly mastered no other one is needed for the purpose of tuition, for it is the key to everything that has been written for the king of instruments. The print is exceedingly clear, and the book itself neat and attractive.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS.

This is not an "instruction" book in the ordinary use of the term, for its scope is too wide, and the information given is so largely the result of personal experiment and experience that those who have already advanced in the art of organ playing will find many hints and suggestions which will prove of practical service. The book is admirably divided into sections dealing with the elements of organ art; and a very important chapter is that on hymn-playing.

THE SUNDAY TIMES.

Every young organ student will find himself greatly helped by "The Organ," a new manual of the instrument by Dr. Alcock.

THE BOOKSELLER.

Dr. Alcock has produced a very helpful and useful book which the ambitious player will do well to study with great care and attention; he who follows the directions here given will undoubtedly find his work as an organist very materially assisted.

CHURCH FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

Written by a master of his subject, "The Organ" makes an immediate appeal to organists of all descriptions, for the matter contained in the book embraces all that is necessary from simple pedal exercises—called by some "first steps"—up to pieces requiring all the resources of modern organ technique.

PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, and experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

Occasional use has been made of a portion of the old Plainsong melody generally associated with the words.

Copyright, 1913, by Novello and Company, Limited.

The musical score is written for four vocal parts (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and piano accompaniment. The key signature is one sharp (F#), and the time signature is common time (C). The score is divided into three systems, each with four vocal staves and two piano staves.

First System: The vocal parts sing "bless - ed light, . .". The piano accompaniment features a melody in the right hand and a supporting bass line in the left hand. Dynamics include mf (mezzo-forte) and mp (mezzo-piano).

Second System: The vocal parts sing "U - ni - ty of sov - 'reign might, . .". The piano accompaniment continues with a similar texture. Dynamics include p (piano) and mf.

Third System: The vocal parts sing "sun now goes his way ; . . .". The piano accompaniment includes a section marked mp and poco cres. (poco crescendo).

Additional markings include "Gt. to Ped. in." (Guitar to Pedal in) and "Solo S.ft." (Solo Soft). The score concludes with a double bar line and a page number.

The first system of the musical score consists of five staves. The first four staves are vocal parts (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, and Bass) in G major, marked a tempo. and f. The lyrics are: "ter - ni - ty. . . . O Trin - i - ty of". The fifth staff is the piano accompaniment, also in G major, marked a tempo. and f. The piano part features a melodic line in the right hand and a more rhythmic line in the left hand, with some chords.

The second system of the musical score consists of five staves. The first four staves are vocal parts, marked poco riten. and f. The lyrics are: "bless - ed light, . . . of bless - ed light. . .". The fifth staff is the piano accompaniment, marked poco riten. and f. The piano part continues the melodic and rhythmic themes from the first system. The system concludes with a Tempo lmo. marking and a mf Sw. dim. poco a poco. instruction for the piano part, which includes a Gt. to Ped. in. marking.

Miscellaneous.

The Exhibitions offered annually by the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and Royal College of Music, which entitle their holders to free tuition at the R.A.M. or the R.C.M. for two or three years, have been awarded to the following candidates: Gladys L. England, Betty Polischuk (pianoforte), Elsie H. B. Bernard (violin), at the R.A.M.; Herbert D. Blanchard (violin), Dorothy F. M. Smithard (singing), and Caroline H. Fotheringham (organ), at the R.C.M.

A Stradivarius violin was sold for £550 at an auction held by Messrs. Puttick & Simpson on December 16. £400 was given for a violin by Guadagnini, £140 for a violoncello by Ponomi, £130 for a violin by Guarnerius, £125 for a violoncello by Ruggierus. Altogether twenty instruments changed hands for a total sum of £2,295.

On December 18 the Guildhall School of Music gave an excellent performance of German's 'Tom Jones,' under the direction of Mr. Landon Ronald. Two further performances were arranged for December 19 and 20 with Mr. Hubert Bath as assistant-conductor.

A complimentary dinner was given on November 20, at Cirencester, to Mr. A. H. Gibbons (conductor of Cirencester Choral Society since 1890, organist and choir-master at the Parish Church since 1896) in honour of his twenty-five years of useful work on behalf of music in the neighbourhood.

The special benefit matinée to Mr. William Ludwig, held at His Majesty's Theatre on December 8, was a notable success. A long array of first-class talent was fully appreciated by a crowded audience. A sum of over £300 was realised.

Mr. Frederick Corder will lecture on 'Neglected musical composers (Ludwig Spohr, Henry Bishop, and Joachim Raff)' at the Royal Institution, Albemarle Street, on January 24 and 31, and February 7, each day at 3 p.m. There will be musical illustrations.

The organ recital at Newlands U.F. Church referred to in our last issue (p. 799) was given by Mr. Sydney L. K. Crookes with the assistance of Mr. Purcell Mansfield.

We are obliged to postpone comment on the Church music controversy that has raged in The Morning Post recently.

The orchestra at Aix-la-Chapelle was far, far superior, not so much in numbers, but as to the playing. But this is one of the faulty conditions under which we have to work in this country, but which I am glad to say will now soon be removed, for I foretell that very soon an opera company will travel with its complete orchestra. In fact I will almost promise to say that on the next visit we pay to Bournemouth we shall do without any of the local orchestra. Let me at once add that this is nothing against the local orchestra as players. I shall bring my whole orchestra simply because it is impossible for local performers to play such operas as 'Tannhäuser' or 'Lohengrin,' with only one rehearsal of an hour or two on the morning of the performance. The German orchestra at Aix-la-Chapelle gives at this watering-place three concerts each day during the summer, and plays at the Opera House during the winter; and for all this work they have the priceless knowledge that they will have a pension in their old age, although I believe they get only 25s. a week before they come to that happy time. The whole method of operating in this country is in a state of chaos, and under the circumstances it seems to me that we should be grateful that we are able to hear any opera at all!—Yours truly,

CHARLES MANNERS.

WORD-PLAY IN MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Dr. Walford Davies, in his article on the tempered or imperfectly-tuned scale, has raised a very remarkable analogy worth notice.

He writes (p. 788) 'Its out-of-tuneness involved' an 'imperfection of all intervals except the octave the mind has a certain transforming power to see or hear the perfective through the defective.'

This is true of a larger subject-matter than music. At Oxford in the Plato class Jowitt used to ask freshmen, 'How do you get your original ideas, say, of a perfect circle?' Usual answer: 'From seeing perfect circles around me in nature.' Examiner: 'But you have never seen a perfect circle. No compasses, no geometry can produce such a thing' (an obvious truth!).

The solution is to be found in the words quoted above. 'The mind has a certain transforming power, &c.'—I am, yours truly,

EDWARD CUTLER.

Correspondence.

OPERA AT BOURNEMOUTH.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—With regard to your critic's friendly little notice in your paper, let me first of all thank him. But in the cause of Grand Opera in this country, I would like to say a friendly word about his criticism. Whenever I approach a statesman or a millionaire his one answer to my plea for patronage is 'Do the people want it? Look at what you see round you in Grand Opera; if the people do want it, then I shall be pleased to help.' Therefore, is it not the proper thing for all interested to do their best to tolerate as far as possible even the 'incomplete stage performance' so that it may be proved that Grand Opera is needed? But was the 'incomplete performance' given at Bournemouth by my company so incomplete as your correspondent says? The company (I state a fact) was larger than the one I myself saw at Aix-la-Chapelle a few months ago, and I know the numbers of both companies. Of course there can always be different opinions about the principals. Some people say they do not like even Tetrizzini or Melba. But as a manager I declare that there were not two principals at Aix-la-Chapelle to whom I would have offered engagements to come and join my 'incomplete company.' The prices were far higher in every part of the house than those we charged at Bournemouth. I candidly confess that my orchestra was a weak point.

Obituary.

We regret to announce the following deaths:

WILLIAM WEBSTER PEARSON, at South Walsham, Norfolk, on December 5. He was born at Bishop Auckland, Durham, September 27, 1839. To a great extent he was a self-taught musician. He composed numerous part-songs and anthems, and much dance music, and he has left many compositions in manuscript. Some of his part-songs attained great popularity. Among them may be mentioned 'Three Doughtie men,' 'The Ironfounder,' and 'Sweet to live amid the mountains.' For many years he played 2nd violin in a famous local quintet party at East Dereham, and was conductor of numerous bands, teacher of the violin, organ, and pianoforte. When the present Watts' Naval College, North Elmham, was a large public school, he was master of music and art there. He was a very good amateur artist, and had painted numerous oil- and water-colour pictures. For thirty-five years he was organist and choir-master of the North Elmham Parish Church. He was the inventor of a system of sight-singing called 'Substitution of Pitch' or 'Staff Tonic Sol-fa,' also of a staff modulator.

In our last issue we recorded briefly the sudden death of GEORGE ARTHUR CLINTON. We now give a portrait of the well-known clarinet-player, and further particulars of his 'useful career.' He was born at Newcastle on December 16, 1850. At the age of ten he began his career as a clarinetist in the band of the First Newcastle Artillery Volunteers. During the six years of his service in this connection he studied harmony under his father, who was the bandmaster of the regiment. In 1867 he was appointed principal and solo clarinet in H.M. Queen Victoria's Private Band, a position which he held until the year 1900. From 1870 to 1875 he studied harmony, composition and instrumentation under the late Sir William Cusins. In 1873 he became principal clarinet in the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society, at whose concerts he appeared five times as a soloist. In 1874 he became principal clarinet in the Crystal Palace Orchestra, and remained there for twenty-four years, in the course of which he appeared frequently as a soloist, playing the Concertos of Mozart, Weber, Spohr, Rietz, &c. In 1875 he joined the Royal Choral Society's Orchestra, of which he remained a member until his death. For a few years from 1879 he was engaged at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, and in 1890 he was appointed professor of the clarinet at the Royal Military School of Music, Kneller Hall, the Royal Academy of Music, and Trinity College, London—positions which he held up to the time of his death. In 1896 he organized a series of concerts in which the leading feature was chamber-music for wind instruments, either alone or in conjunction with strings. Three concerts of this description were given every year from 1896 till 1903 at Queen's (Small) Hall. Many leading artists took part in them, and a very large number of works were performed. In 1909 he completed a new edition of Frederic Berr's 'Method' for the clarinet, and in 1911 he brought out new editions of many clarinet studies. These works are remarkable for the minute attention given to the details of fingering and phrasing. His execution on the instrument was little short of marvellous, and the brilliancy and power of his playing entitle him to a foremost place among the great clarinetists of the world—of this or any other age. As a man he was of a kindly disposition with a fund of quick humour and an enormous capacity for hard work. He was satisfied with nothing but the very best, and his motto was 'thorough.'

Major Stretton, M.V.O., Director of Music at Kneller Hall, says:

'The late Mr. Clinton was extremely successful in his teaching and very much sought after here. He had a merry, commanding manner, and received the good will of all his pupils—students and boys—by his conscientiousness and artistic treatment of his instruction. His pupils in the Army can be counted by hundreds, so you can imagine the extent of the good work he accomplished for us. His collection of chamber music is to be presented to the School as a 'G. A. Clinton Library' and a token of his regard. I shall be delighted to receive such a valuable collection of wind works, which will be of the utmost value to players here.'

FREDERICK EDWARD WALKER, on November 27, at his residence, 37, St. Gabriel's Road, Cricklewood, London, N. He was born on January 17, 1835. He entered H.M. Chapels Royal as a boy chorister in 1844, and remained there five years. At the time he left Arthur Sullivan and the brothers Cellier were admitted to the choir. He next went to a private school in Scotland, kept by the Rev. J. D'Orsey, who was a fine master of elocution. As he was also a professor at the High School of Glasgow, his boys had the privilege of attending classes held there. Walker was soon appointed organist and choirmaster of the School. He was then fifteen years of age. At the age of seventeen he left Glasgow to become organist and choirmaster at the Church of the Holy Spirit, situated on the Island of Cumbrae. Here he continued for two years, studying and playing. On his return to London he became assistant-organist to Mr. George Hills, at St. Barnabas, Pimlico, and from there he went as organist and choirmaster to St. Mary-the-Less, Lambeth, the Rev. Robert Gregory, late Dean of St. Paul's, being the vicar (or rector). In 1855 he fulfilled a like office at St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, and as his voice was returning he studied singing under John Wass, and was called to St. Paul's Cathedral about 1858, becoming permanent deputy in the choir for the late Charles Lockey. In 1867 he was appointed Master of the Boys. On his retirement from this post in 1874 he received a vicar-choralship, a position which he held until the day of his death. In 1875, on the invitation of Sir George Macfarren, he accepted a professorship of singing at the Royal Academy of Music. This post he resigned at Christmas, 1912, in consequence of failing health. He was also a professor at the Guildhall School of Music from 1880-1903. As a boy and man he knew and sang with Jenny Lind. Mendelssohn frequently visited the Chapel Royal House, and Walker enjoyed many opportunities of being in the composer's company and hearing him play. As a teacher his connection was very large, many students coming from America and the Colonies. He prepared for stage and concert-platform, but his favourite branch of teaching was oratorio. Walker had the art of endearing himself to innumerable friends. This was owing not only to his exceptional ability and modesty, but even more to a peculiar gracious and amiable manner that at once won respect and regard. The funeral took place on December 4. The first part of the service was held at St. Gabriel's Church, Cricklewood, and the interment took place at St. Pancras Cemetery, Finchley. The officiating clergy were Canon Edgar Sheppard and Canon Simpson. The musical portions of the service were sung by the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral, under the conductorship of Sir George Martin.

The Hon. G. W. SPENCER LYTTETTON, on December 5, 1913. He was a distinguished amateur musician, taking an active part in many musical enterprises, and was a member of the council and the executive committee of the Royal College of Music, and vice-chairman of the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music. For some years he filled the office of private secretary to the late Mr. Gladstone. He was born on June 12, 1847.

The following sad announcements came together in the Daily Telegraph on December 17:

OULD.—On October 29, suddenly, at Grahamstown, South Africa, Mary, the beloved wife of Percy Edward Ould, F.R.A.M., and eldest daughter of the late Archdeacon Woodrooffe.

OULD.—On December 13, at Grahamstown, South Africa, Percy Edward, younger son of the late Charles Ould, and Director of Studies, Training College School of Music, Grahamstown, aged forty-five. (By cable.)

GRAND OPERA IN ENGLISH.

MR. RAYMOND RÔZE'S SEASON.

In the presence of Their Majesties the King and Queen, Mr. Raymond Rôze brought his season of grand opera in English at Covent Garden to an end on December 13. The work chosen for the occasion was that which formed the fons et origo of the whole undertaking, namely, Mr. Rôze's own 'Joan of Arc.' The occasion was disfigured by a Suffragist disturbance, although the tactics of the militants had small effect on an audience assembled to witness the exercise of the more peaceful art of music.

'CARMEN.'

If Mr. Rôze has not fulfilled all his promises he at least kept his word in one important particular, and that was to introduce a new version in English of the words of Bizet's 'Carmen.' The immense popularity of this opera was not foreseen well-nigh forty years ago, and the English translation provided by Henry Hersee was far from perfect. Recently an attempt has been made by Mr. Hermann Klein to remedy its deficiencies by the provision of an entirely new version. This was used by Mr. Rôze. In a large measure it was successful, although it failed to remove one of the great stumbling-blocks—the 'Toreador's Song.' The performance itself was chiefly notable for the assumption by Madame Pauline Donalda of the chief part. In its quiet way it was effective, but did not efface memories of Minnie Hauk, Emma Calvé, or Maria Gay. The remainder of the cast was not of a distinguished order, though well within the requirements of general utility. Mr. Charles Mott's vigorous and incisive style was of service to the part of the Toreador, which was well given in spite of the fact that he 'queered the pitch' of the whole aim of the production by singing his song to the Hersee and not to the Klein words. Miss Violet Essex made a pretty Michaela, though she failed to show present grasp of the real business of operatic singing; and M. Raoul Torrent as Don José was handicapped by want of sufficient strength of voice and breadth of acting. The stage-management was of the kind that left nothing to the imagination. The chorus-singing was not very good, since the singers did not show themselves to be very familiar with their parts; but Mr. Hamilton Harty's conducting was spirited and perceptive.

'LOHENGRIN.'

The zenith of the season was reached when Wagner's 'Lohengrin' was given. This was Mr. Rôze's best production. From out of his numerous company he was able to contrive an excellent cast, and the view of his well-wishers was that he would have done better to have begun with a representation such as this. In it Mr. John Coates once more proved a tower of artistic strength by his remarkably spiritual impersonation of Lohengrin. Madame Lilian Granfelt made a serviceable Elsa, Mlle. Wittkowska an admirable Ortruda, sinister but forcible, and Mr. Charles Mott a sound Telramund. Their plottings were thoroughly well done. Mr. Norman Williams displayed fine promise as the Herald, and Mr. Manitto Klitgaard was the King, but without the fundamental sonority suitable to the music. The chorus was good. The artistic triumph of the evening was the conducting of Mr. Julius Harrison, who gave a remarkably fine reading effectively conveyed. To this list the ever-charming 'Hansel and Gretel' was added in due course, in which there was some pretty, if not particularly mature, singing by Mlle. Juliette Autran, Miss Sybil Vane, Mr. Harry Reynolds, and Miss Dora Gibson. Mr. Frank Bridge conducted. The season has once more shown the latent possibilities of native singers in the direction of opera, and also their need of suitable preparation in school and by hard and fast experience.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

PERFORMANCE OF VERDI'S 'FALSTAFF.'

The Royal College of Music celebrated the centenary of Verdi by performing his masterpiece, 'Falstaff,' at His Majesty's Theatre on November 28. This was the third time in the history of the College that the work had been given by students, the previous occasions being in 1896 and 1908. The cast at the present performance was as follows:

Sir John Falstaff	William R. Allen.
Fenton (a Young Gentleman)	J. Hardy Williamson.
Ford (a Wealthy Burgher)	Samuel Mann.
Dr. Caius (a Physician)	Victor R. Chilley.
Bardolph	T. Glyn Walters.
Pistol	Walter J. Saull.
Mistress Ford	Winifred F. Cooper.
Anne (her Daughter)	Clara M. Simons.
Mistress Page	Alice G. Gear.
Dame Quickly	Marjorie V. Lockey.

The performance was a strikingly good one in every particular. Mr. Allen showed uncommon capacity as an actor, the Merry Wives seemed to the manner born both as regards singing and acting, and the whole company worked together happily. The English version by Mr. W. Beatty Kingston was used. The orchestra, which was composed mainly of past and present students, was admirable. Sir Charles Stanford conducted, Mr. Cairns James was stage director, Mr. Harold Samuel the chorus-master, and the very effective dances were arranged by Mr. B. Soutten.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

The resignation of M. Messager not having been ratified by the Minister of Fine Arts, the management of the Grand-Opéra will continue in its present form until the end of 1914. M. Charbonnel has been appointed manager of the Théâtre de la Gaîté-Lyrique.

At the Opéra-Comique has taken place the first performance of M. Emile Trépard's 'Céleste,' the last novelty to be produced by M. Albert Carré. The work, elaborately realistic in style, was moderately successful. The principal parts were filled by Mlle. Brunlet, Mlle. Brohly, MM. Rousselière and de Creus. Mlle. Brunlet, a very gifted débutante, won unanimous praise.

The Concerts-Lamoureux have provided M. Paul Dukas's 'La Péri' and excerpts from M. Albert Roussel's charming ballet-score, 'Le Festin de l'Araignée.' Excerpts from 'Parsifal' have been given both at the Concerts-Lamoureux and at the Concerts-Colonne.

The Société des Compositeurs Brétons has devoted a most attractive concert to works by MM. Guy-Ropartz, Le Flem, Huré, Ladmirault, Vuillemin, Swan Hennessy, and Mlle. Alice Sauvrezis.

The Schola Cantorum devoted its first concert to the 'Funereal Cantata,' the selection made comprising examples by Bach, Josquin des Prés, Rust, Beethoven, and Ernest Chausson. Mlle. Blanche Selva's recitals of Pianoforte suites by Bach, his forerunners and contemporaries, are very successful.

Mlle. Selva has recently published a well-informed and thoughtful book on 'The Sonata, ancient and modern.'

Among the best pianoforte recitals of the month should be mentioned those of Madame Jeanne Mortier, at which M. Erik Satie's 'Embryons desséchés,' played for the first time, were heartily applauded and encored; and of M. Pierre Lucas, who introduced M. Schmitt's 'Sylphides,' M. Aubert's 'Esquisses,' and M. Grovlez's 'l'Almanach aux Images.'

At the first concert of the Société Musicale Indépendante the best numbers were songs by M. Alfred Bruneau, sung by Mlle. Féart, new pianoforte pieces by M. Fauré, charmingly played by M. Casella, and a String quartet by M. Darius Milhaud—a very young composer whose Violin sonata produced last year was received with favour, and who has recently scored another success with his songs to words by M. Paul Claudel.

At his song-recital given on December 8, M. Eriqué sang in no fewer than five languages, Russian included. Among the numbers were Arnold Schönberg's 'Natur,' and a remarkably good 'Prière du Mort' by the French composer, Charles Koechlin.

One of the forthcoming concerts of M. Robert Schmitz's Orchestral and Choral Association will be devoted to modern British music.

At one of the musical matinées given at the Lyceum Club were introduced several works by Madame Fleury-Roy. Madame Fleury-Roy is an earnest and talented composer. She had entered the competition for the Prix de Rome, but a year after having taken a second prize, shared M. Maurice Ravel's fate in being rejected at the preliminary examination.

M. Claude Debussy's miniature ballet, 'La Boîte à Joujoux,' with illustrations by the author of the plot, M. André Hellé, has recently appeared.

M. M.-D. Calvocoressi's yearly course on 'Tendencies of contemporary music,' at L'Ecole des Hautes Etudes Sociales, will begin on January 16, at 3 p.m., and continue on the following Fridays. It is to comprise, this year, sidelights on the Hungarian school (Bartók, Kodály, Zagon), Arnold Schönberg, Stravinsky's 'Sacre du Printemps,' Cyril Scott, Joan Manen, the Spanish composer, and a young ultra-modern composer Léo Ornstein, who is said to out-Schönberg Schönberg. Other courses to be given at the same school are: 'Musical æsthetics,' by M. E. Bloch; 'Interpretation of ancient music,' by MM. Expert and Rangel; 'Musical history,' by MM. Vincent d'Indy, André Pirro, Prunières, and Cucuel; and 'Keltic music,' by M. Maurice Duhamel.

The celebrated pianist E. M. Delaborde has died, at the age of seventy-four. He had been for forty years a professor at the Conservatoire, where he gave his last class a bare week before his death. He will be remembered as an earnest, disinterested, energetic artist.

PRESENTATION TO PROFESSOR SANFORD TERRY.

In recognition of the distinguished services which Professor C. Sanford Terry has rendered to the cause of music at Aberdeen (and in Scotland generally) a presentation was made to him on December 12. The occasion was a concert of the Aberdeen University Choral and Orchestral Society, of which he was conductor until his recent retirement from active musical work. The gift, which was handed by Mr. J. Alexander Innes, chairman of the Society, took the form of a portrait of Professor Terry by Mr. Allen Sutherland. A sketch of Professor Terry's career was given in our issue for June, 1913.

Several of his compositions were included in the programme of the concert, which was given under the direction of Mr. T. E. Wright.

'WESTWARD HO!'

With the strong recommendation of being based on a national story in the shape of Kingsley's famous novel of the same name, the opera 'Westward Ho!' (composed by Mr. P. Napier Miles, and produced by the students of the London Academy of Music at the Lyceum Theatre on December 4 and 5) went half-way towards success. The music is scored with good knowledge of the orchestra, although the sense of the stage is not very strongly expressed. The performance was not of a kind to bring out what dramatic force the work might possess, although the libretto, by Mr. E. F. Benson, is not without its stimulating passages. In the hands of performers more self-reliant the result might have been different. Miss Hope Charteris as Rose, Mr. Philip Brandreth as Amyas, Mr. W. Ellis as Frank, Mr. Raymond Ellis as Guzman, and Mr. William Waite, all worked hard according to their means. Mr. Henry Beaumont conducted, and Mr. Athol Stewart was the stage-manager.

THE NEW PHILHARMONIC HALL.

We note with interest the re-opening of the Hall in Great Portland Street under the title of the Philharmonic Hall. Erected a few years ago as 'St. James's Hall,' the building remained open as a concert-hall for a few unsuccessful seasons and then lay fallow. A syndicate with Chevalier Arrigo Bocchi as manager has now acquired, re-decorated and re-christened it, and on December 5 it was formally re-opened by Mr. Landon Ronald. The raised seats and organ-front have been removed, and the platform has been transformed to represent, as we are given to understand, a Watteau drawing-room. The chief interest, however, lies in the lighting. While the auditorium is in semi-darkness the platform is brilliantly illuminated, even footlights being used. It is claimed that the performer thus becomes less conscious of the audience and therefore can concentrate better upon his musical purpose. Whether recitalists will agree to this remains to be seen. To us the best augury for the future of the Hall is that its seating capacity (about 1,000) comes between that of Queen's Hall, which is too large for some purposes, and that of Bechstein Hall, which is too small.

CAROL PICTURES.

An originally designed and well-carried-out series of performances of Carol Pictures, Nativity Scenes, and Christmas Legends, opened at the Hall of St. George, Haslemere, on December 17. The organizers of the pictures were Mr. and Mrs. Godfrey Blount, who have for many years devoted their energies to the working of the Peasants' Arts and Industries at Haslemere. The performers are chiefly chosen from the weavers and spinners in the Weaving School and from the Haslemere village children. The living illustrations and pictures for each legend or carol were very simply but realistically grouped and posed, without any attempt at theatrical display or effect, and it is evident that every care had been exercised to arrive as near as possible at a correct portrayal of all the traditional details of fact and symbol. The story of each picture was either told by a narrator, or else the carol itself was sung by a choir. Amongst the carols chosen were: 'In the bleak mid-winter,' 'Bethlehem,' 'Come to the manger,' 'A wassail,' 'Lullay, Lullay,' 'The three kings,' 'Whilst shepherds watched,' 'As I sat on a sunny bank,' 'The cherry-tree carol,' and 'Children, come hither.' A series of legendary tableaux depicted various scenes in the life of St. Nicholas, and that saint's transformation into 'Santa Claus,' or 'Father Christmas'; and another set of pictures illustrated the old French folk-tale of the shepherd maid, Madelon, and the origin of the Christmas Rose. The series was arranged to take place on four consecutive evenings from December 17 to 20.

London Concerts.

THE ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

On November 27 this Society introduced to London M. Saint-Saëns's new oratorio, 'The Promised Land.' As the work was fully noticed in our columns in connection with its first production at Gloucester on September 11, 1913, we need now only refer to its performance on the present occasion. Conceived as to important choral sections on broad—almost, one is disposed to say, on Handelian—lines, it was only to be expected that they would be broadly effective in the large area of the Royal Albert Hall. As technically the work presents no difficulties, the huge choir of 1,000 singers sang with great freedom and imposing sonority. The soloists were Miss Ruth Vincent, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow.

The second part of the concert was devoted to Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan.' This work has evidently caught the fancy of choral concert-goers. Its melodiousness and warmth of colour are easy to appreciate and enjoy. Sir Frederick Bridge conducted as usual, and Mr. H. L. Balfour was the organist.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

A wonderful all-British programme was submitted by this Society at the concert given at Queen's Hall on December 3. It comprised a poem, 'King Arthur' (Charlton Speer); a cantata, 'The eve of St. Agnes' (John Francis Barnett); a cantata, 'Dream Tryst' (H. V. Jervis-Read); still another cantata, 'April' (H. Balfour Gardiner); and two part-songs, 'At twilight' and 'Brigg Fair' (by Percy Grainger), all of which were performed for the first time. 'News from Whydah' (H. Balfour Gardiner), the popular cantata, was, as it were, thrown in as a bonus. Mr. Speer's work is frankly Victorian. It shows musicianship and a sense of orchestral colour, and was at least fairly interesting generally. 'April' is a thoroughly characteristic piece, displaying the fancy and originality we now associate with Mr. Gardiner's work. The words (by Edward Carpenter) invite passionate music. The chief interest was in Mr. Barnett's cantata. It says not a little for this composer's mental energy that at his age (seventy-six) he was able to produce such an elaborate and interesting work. 'The Eve of St. Agnes' (words by Keats) attracts by reason of its eminently vocal character. All the choruses show the skill and fluency of the practised composer who has the instinct to write what can be sung with pleasure, and heard not as a problem. The orchestral parts show much variety of rhythmic treatment and well-applied colour. The solos, which were sung by Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Lily Grahame, Mr. Hughes Macklin, and Mr. Dawson Freer, provide much scope for effect without sacrificing artistic merit. Although the music cannot be described as modern, it will, we believe, appeal to a large circle of choral Societies and audiences where natural melody and simplicity are craved for. 'Dream Tryst' has no very striking moments, but it is thoughtful and interesting. The choral performance throughout, and especially of Mr. Barnett's work, was excellent. There was that flow in the rhythm and certainty in attack that come only from experience. Mr. Arthur Fagge conducted, except in the Balfour Gardiner works, in which the composer himself officiated. All the orchestral work was safe in the hands of the London Symphony Orchestra.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

An all-Russian programme at the third concert of the season, given at the Queen's Hall on December 11, and conducted by M. Safonoff, drew a large audience. The programme was as follows:

'Symphonie Pathétique'	Tchaikovsky
'Dans L'Aoul' (from 'Esquisses Caucasiennes,' Op. 10)	Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
Tone-picture, 'Spring'	Glazounoff
Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor (Soloist, Joseph Lhevinne.)		Tchaikovsky
'Easter' Overture	Rimsky-Korsakoff

The 'Pathetic' still maintains its wonderful fascination over audiences. M. Safonoff has his own reading, and it is a powerful one. We do not remember ever before having heard a more exciting and thrilling interpretation of the third movement. Ippolitoff-Ivanoff's piece is remarkable for its colour and impelling rhythmic life. A feature was the use of the 'Timplipito' (a skin stretched over a jar and played with light wooden drumsticks). The specimen used was brought from the Caucasus by M. Safonoff. Glazounoff's work is a light and pleasing exemplification of this composer's musicianly style. The Concerto, although very well played, did not create a great impression. The 'Easter' Overture is a piece of gorgeous and picturesque orchestration. Neither Strauss nor Scriabine has essayed to produce a more prodigious sound than has to be endured in the climax of this Overture. But there was much to be thankful for.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

The twentieth anniversary of the opening of the Queen's Hall was celebrated on November 25 by the choice of that date for the annual benefit concert to Mr. Robert Newman. It is significant of the debt owed by musical London to Mr. Newman and his fellow-worker, Sir Henry Wood, that the 'popular' programme chosen contained Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony and Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto. There were also the 'Meistersinger' and 'Tannhäuser' Overtures, and some works of Percy Grainger. The pianist was Miss Adela Verne.

Glinka's Orchestral Fantasia 'Kamarinskaya' was the first item of an interesting programme given on November 29, and it proved to be a very attractive and exhilarating work. It was played from a new edition revised and corrected by Rimsky-Korsakoff and Glazounoff. The 'Fantastic Symphony' of Berlioz (Op. 16a) was the central feature of the concert. It displays at once the strength and weakness of its composer. A glitter of orchestral colour and device fascinates attention, but there is not much else that satisfies. Mr. Percy Grainger gave a masterful and robust performance of Saint-Saëns's second Pianoforte concerto (in G minor) which stirred the audience greatly. The last number on the programme was the Orchestral Suite 'L'Oiseau de feu,' by Igor Stravinsky. As an exemplification of the Russian school (if there really be one) the Suite affords more food for dubious reflection as to the trend of things than it did of positive enjoyment. It was, however, worth while to hear the music away from the glamour of the ballet, if only to fix attention on its appeal as purely musical art. The result, as we have said, was not wholly convincing. The enlarged orchestra (over a hundred performers) was throughout the afternoon in its best form under Sir Henry Wood.

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Although the public were slow to support the Elgar concert to which reference was made in our columns last month, Mr. Landon Ronald, with persevering and self-sacrificing courage, decided to repeat the experiment. He is determined to drive it into the public mind that Elgar's second Symphony and his 'Falstaff' are among the most powerful and beautiful works of modern times. So with the new Symphony Orchestra he performed both works again at Queen's Hall on November 28, and filled up the programme with the most famous of the 'Pomp and Circumstance' Marches and a selection from the 'Sea Pictures,' sung by Miss Muriel Foster. The interpretation and the execution of the music were again of arresting quality, and certainly in the case of 'Falstaff' new beauties were revealed. This notable work appeals more deeply with each hearing. As familiarity eases the strain of following the sense of its ever-changing current of ideas, effects, and moods, one is more than ever astonished at its inventiveness and amazed at the mastery of its orchestral technique. Every number in the programme was enthusiastically received by an audience which, if again smaller than one had hoped, was moved to an unusual degree, as on the former occasion.

'Falstaff' was performed by the New Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Landon Ronald, at the Royal Albert Hall, on Sunday, December 14.

The regular series of Symphony concerts was continued on December 4, when an excellent programme was varied with the singing of Miss Elena Gerhardt, and with the combined playing of Miss Isolde Menges and Mr. Daniel Melsa in Bach's Concerto for two violins. Mr. Landon Ronald conducted an exceptionally attractive performance of Brahms's second Symphony, and Debussy's 'Danse sacrée et profane,' with Mr. J. T. Cockerill as harpist, was in the programme.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Brahms's fourth Symphony, which is greatly respected but seldom performed, was given under Herr Steinbach on November 24. Being intimate with the work, and finding himself in a position to obtain the full expression of his ideas, Herr Steinbach gave a memorable interpretation. Mozart's E flat Symphony was also performed in a manner unusually interesting. A Handel Concerto for strings in D minor and Schumann's 'Genoveva' Overture completed the programme. Herr Steinbach again conducted on December 8, when Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony attracted the chief musical interest. It was interpreted in a manner that upheld the customary standard of these concerts. Mr. Mark Hambourg gave a dashing performance of Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Pianoforte concerto, and the programme was made up with the 'Siegfried Idyll' and Berlioz's 'Corsair' Overture.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

Nearly all the seats at Queen's Hall were occupied on December 1, when the Stock Exchange Choral and Orchestral Society gave an interesting concert. The principal number in the programme was Glazounoff's Violin concerto in A, which Miss Isolde Menges played with great verve. The male-voice choir varied the interest with glees and part-songs under the direction of Mr. Frank Idle. The orchestral playing, under the conductorship of Mr. Hamish MacCunn, and the choral-singing were on a high level.

Miss Isolde Menges was again engaged as soloist on December 4, when the Strolling Players gave a 'ladies' night' concert at the Queen's Hall, her contribution being the Tchaikovsky Concerto. The orchestra, ably conducted by Mr. Joseph Ivimey, gave excellent performances of Haydn's 'Clock' Symphony and some smaller works. The vocalist of the evening was Mr. Peter Dawson.

One of the interesting concerts of the Great Eastern Railway Musical Society took place at Hamilton Hall, Liverpool Street, on December 10, when Wagner's 'Meistersinger' Overture was repeated, and the programme consisted further of an excellent selection of works. Lady Speyer played Bach's E major Violin concerto, and Mr. Hamilton Harty's 'Irish Fantasy,' Sir Henry Wood conducting. Songs were given by Miss Marjorie Walker and Miss Ivy Lush, and the male-voice choir played a creditable part in the entertainment of a large audience. Mr. W. Johnson Galloway was, as usual, conductor-in-chief.

The Royal Amateur Orchestral Society gave a Smoking Concert at Queen's Hall on December 10, under the direction of Mr. Arthur W. Payne. The principal number, Bizet's 'L'Arlesienne' Suite, was excellently played. The soloists were Miss Christine d'Almayne and Mr. Julien Henry.

Taste for old music increases and multiplies wherever Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch directs his activity. He indulged his hobby with a series of three concerts at Clifford's Inn on November 19, December 2 and 17, assisted, as usual, by other members of his family. The most interesting piece in his first programme was a Fantasia for four violas from Morley's 'Plain and easy introduction to practical music.' There was music for virginal, harpsichord, and clavichord, played upon the instruments for which it was written, many songs, and a canzonet by Morley for two voices accompanied by viols. Similar programmes were offered at the later concerts, in which Mr. Dolmetsch took the chief part as performer on various old instruments, and assistance was given by other artists besides the Dolmetsch family.

Miss Marjorie Ffrancon-Davies, a Lieder singer of considerable power, made her first appearance on November 20, the occasion being a 'Twelve o'clock' concert at Eolian Hall. A week later, at a concert of the same series, Rubinstein's G minor Trio was performed with spirit by Miss Ivy Angove (violin), Mr. C. Warwick Evans (violoncello), and Miss Mathilde Verne (pianist). The concert of this series given on December 4 commemorated the anniversary of the death of Mozart with a programme mainly composed of his works. Solomon, the boy-pianist, was the central figure at the concert given on December 11.

Two interesting concerts by the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society have to be placed on record. On November 22 Verdi's 'Requiem' was performed in magnificent style under Mr. Allen Gill. The choruses in the work were well suited to the Society's well-known capacities, and the singers threw their full resources of tone and expressiveness into their work. The soloists were Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Lily Crawforth, Mr. Lenghi-Cellini, and Mr. Robert Radford. On December 13 a large selection from Bantock's 'Omar Khayyam' was given. The choir again showed its resourcefulness, and the solo parts were sung with sincerity by Miss Mary Lindsay, Miss Violet Oppenshaw, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Thorpe Bates.

The feature of the concert given by Mr. Raymond Rôze, at Covent Garden, on November 23, was the singing of Madame Aino Ackté, who was heard in an excerpt from Sieglinde's music in Act 1 of 'Die Walküre.' Other able artists appeared, and an interesting selection of orchestral music was given under Mr. Julius Harrison and Mr. Frank Bridge.

Dr. R. R. Terry gave the third of his Bach Chamber Concerts at Westminster Cathedral Hall on November 25. Two Cantatas were given—'Ich armer Mensch' and 'Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen'—with Miss Violet Runciman, Mr. Robert Cunningham, and Cathedral choir-boys as soloists; the Concerto in C for three pianofortes was given by Miss Adela Hamaton, Madame Lily Henkel, and Mr. E. S. Mitchell, with accompaniment of strings; and Miss Jesse Grimson (violin), Mr. T. Neale (flute), and Madame Henkel played a Concerto in A minor. The concert provided many moments of admirable playing and singing.

The choral and orchestral 'Requiem Mass' by Sgambati, the well-known pianist of Rome, was given at Queen's Hall on November 27 for the first time in London, the occasion being the last of Mr. Vivian Hamilton's concerts. It was performed by the Alexandra Palace Choral Society, under Mr. Allen Gill, the Queen's Hall Orchestra, and Mr. William Higley as baritone soloist. We are familiar with the effect of Italian instincts adapted to the ideals of sacred music. Sgambati's 'Requiem' adds another to the list of works among which the lasting value of Verdi's 'Requiem' affords the only exception. There are moments in Sgambati's work when the orchestral or choral writing has an attraction of its own, but as a rule the music has little intrinsic beauty or significance. The evening's programme included part-songs by Mr. Hamilton and his 'Grand valse' for orchestra.

The Fresh Air Art Society is a collection of artists, mainly musical and young, whose distaste for current æsthetics is expressed in a lengthy and somewhat visionary propaganda in which the 'Oneness of Art and Life,' and the 'Eternity of Art as standing for Life' are the cardinal beliefs. It is not necessary to become a proselyte to appraise the value of their concerts, of which the first took place at Æolian Hall on November 28. The chief point of interest was a Pianoforte quintet by M. Nandor Zsolt that revealed a lively imaginative power and a useful creative technique. The remainder was not above the level of art that does not consciously follow the 'Fresh Air' principles.

The concert given by the 'Singverein' under Herr Otto Sondernmann at Queen's Hall, on December 2, served to introduce to London 'Die Macht des Gesanges,' a new work for mixed-voice choir, baritone solo, and orchestra, by the veteran Max Bruch. It showed that the composer's powers of imagination and musicianship are undimmed, and the work left an impression of unmistakable beauty and intellectuality. The solo singer was Mr. Robert Maitland. Miss Carrie Tubb took part in Mendelssohn's 'Loreley,' and the choral programme further included Brahms's 'Song of Destiny.' Miss Rosa Ehrlich played movements from Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole' for violin.

A well-chosen programme of popular orchestral works of the best class was given at Queen's Hall on December 5, by the full band of the Royal Artillery, under the direction of Mr. H. Sims. Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony was performed with good effect.

An 'Orchestral concert for young people' was given by Miss Gwynne Kimpton at Æolian Hall on December 6, the chief number in the programme being Beethoven's now rarely-heard fourth Symphony. The soloists were Miss Elsie Hall (pianist) and Miss Dorothy Ewens (violinist). Mr. Stewart Macpherson was the lecturer.

A large audience attended the concert given by the Shapiro Orchestra at Queen's Hall, under Mr. George Shapiro's direction, on December 14, and listened to an enjoyable performance of Schumann's C major Symphony. Miss Lena Kontorovitch played Brahms's Violin concerto, and the programme further included Wagner excerpts. The orchestra, whose playing is up to the best professional standard, contains over thirty lady instrumentalists.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The British Chamber-music Players, a newly-formed association, gave their first concert at Bechstein Hall on November 19. The members are Mr. Albert Sammons (violin), Mr. Eugene Goossens (violin), Mr. Thomas Peatfield (viola), Mr. Cedric Sharpe (violin), and Mr. Herbert Sharpe (pianoforte). The programme included Pianoforte trios in E flat by Beethoven (Op. 70, No. 2), and in G minor by Sir Charles Stanford, and Schubert's posthumous Pianoforte sonata in B flat. The most interesting feature of the second concert, given on December 10, was Mr. Herbert Sharpe's playing of Moussorgsky's pianoforte works, 'The picture show,' a set of queer pieces to queer subjects, among which 'A stroll among the skulls in the Catacombs' and 'A hut on fowls' legs' are among the queerest. The concerted numbers of the programme were Quartets by Dvorák in E flat and Fauré in C minor.

The concerts of the Classical Society have upheld their high standard. On November 19 Miss Beatrice Harrison (violin), Miss Jelly von Aranyi (violinist), and Mr. Leonard Borwick (pianist) gave a programme in which Brahms's Trio in C major was the centre of interest. The Klingler Quartet played works of Mozart (C major) and Beethoven (A minor) on November 26, and Madame Fanny Davies interpolated pianoforte solos. On December 4 the Klingler Quartet supplied a programme that included Mr. D. F. Tovey's Quartet in G major, that of Schubert in A minor, and Mendelssohn's Octet (given with the London String Quartet). The last-mentioned body took the chief part on December 10, playing with Mr. Percy Grainger in Schumann's E flat major Quintet and accompanying Mr. Gervase Elwes in Dr. Vaughan Williams's song-cycle 'On Wenlock Edge.'

The Wessely Quartet produced a well-written String quartet, by Mr. W. H. Reed, at Bechstein Hall, on November 22. It is consistent with the composer's known achievements in its straightforward harmony, melodic clearness, and deft construction.

The St. Petersburg Quartet have appeared twice recently at Bechstein Hall. On November 25 they played Quartets by Mozart (in F major, No. 9) and Beethoven (Op. 131), and Messrs. Kranz and Bakalejnikoff (the second violin and viola players) gave a Handel 'Passacaglia' with such beauty of tone and precision that the audience demanded, and obtained, an encore. They repeated it with equal success at the Quartet's second concert on November 28. Glière's first Quartet, in A major, and that of Glazounov, in D minor (Op. 70), completed the programme.

The Egerton Quartet of lady string-players, led by Miss Helen Egerton, gave a concert at Steinway Hall on November 27, and showed their quality in credible performances of Quartets by Dittersdorf (in E flat) and Beethoven (in E minor). At a second concert, on December 2, they gave Beethoven's Quartet in G major (Op. 18), and Smetana's 'Aus meinem Leben.'

The Sevcik Quartet gave their only concert of the season at Bechstein Hall on December 2, giving exquisite performances of Dvorák's Quartet in E flat and Beethoven's in G major (Op. 18). M. Lhotsky played Strauss's Violin and Pianoforte sonata with Madame Anny Eisele.

The London Trio gave their fiftieth subscription concert at Æolian Hall on December 15, the programme including the Trios of Dvorák, in F minor (Op. 65), and Beethoven, in E flat (No. 1). Miss Margaret Balfour was the vocal soloist, and M. Pecsikai gave Bach's 'Chaconne.' The playing was of a consistently high order throughout.

VOCAL RECITALS.

Miss Elena Gerhardt's recital at Bechstein Hall on December 9 is referred to in our leading article.

Miss Julia Culp made one of her far too rare appearances on December 16, at Bechstein Hall. Her programme consisted of six Lieder by Schubert, six by Erich J. Wolff, and six by Brahms. The Wolff songs included the beautiful settings of 'Wie Melodie aus reiner Sphäre,' and 'Märchen.' These and indeed all the Lieder were sung with that peculiar charm this gifted artist imparts to everything she attempts. Mr. Coenraad van Bos was a sympathetic accompanist.

Miss Muriel Foster drew a large audience to her recital at Bechstein Hall on December 18. Six songs by Strauss were a strong feature of the programme. They served to exhibit the impressive dignity and breadth of Miss Foster's style. Six Brahms Lieder and four songs in English, respectively by Parry, Delius, Ivor Atkins, and Lidgey, completed the well-selected programme. Mr. Coenraad van Bos was again the accompanist.

Miss Elena Gerhardt appeared at Bechstein Hall on November 20, in company with Mr. Paul Reimers, for a recital of vocal solos and duets. Mr. Reimers's singing well sustained the inevitable comparisons. It was the solo singing of both artists that chiefly gratified the audience. The duets included arrangements, by Wilhelm Beyer of six German Folk-songs.

A recital of unusual interest was that of Herr Reinhold von Warlich, at Æolian Hall, on November 25. The programme consisted of modern German songs by Kahn, Ramrath, Frank, Zwintscher, Eyken, and Wetz. As a whole the subjects chosen and the music fitted to them were a glorification of gloom, but the intellectual and creative power of the hypochondriacs was unfailing, and as an example of expressive and beautiful singing Herr von Warlich's work was quite exceptional. Mr. G. O'Connor Morris accompanied him admirably.

Miss Susan Strong chose an excellent programme of songs by Korbay (five 'Schilf Lieder'), Liszt, Schubert, and Arensky, at Bechstein Hall on November 27.

Miss Clara Butterworth (assisted by Mr. Rowsby Woof, a highly capable violinist) gave a recital at Æolian Hall on December 3. This young singer has made great advance during the last two or three years. Her programme included French, German, and English songs, amongst which were 'Clair de lune' and 'Fantoche,' by Debussy, and 'Zueignung' and 'Ständchen,' by Richard Strauss. A group of English songs by Montague Phillips (who accompanied throughout the recital) proved very interesting and popular. Miss Butterworth's voice is one of beautiful quality. A speciality of her interpretations is the intensity of feeling displayed and the use of strong contrasts.

Herr Hermann Gura, a Lieder singer with a deservedly high reputation, gave a recital of songs by Loewe and Schubert at Bechstein Hall, on December 4.

At Æolian Hall, on December 4, Mr. Plunket Greene introduced a new Irish Song-cycle by Sir Charles Stanford, entitled 'A fire of turf,' a setting of seven poems by W. M. Letts. It revealed both composer and interpreter at their best,—the former with his power to express gaiety, wistfulness, pathos, and other contrasted moods, with consistent individuality and beauty of idea, and the latter with his command over all the resources of the interpreter's art. The accompaniments were played by the composer. Many other good things were offered to the audience in the course of this recital.

Mr. Robert Maitland, in giving a recital at Bechstein Hall on December 6, again showed himself one of the best of our Lieder singers.

Two clever and beautiful new French songs by Madame Poldowski (Lady Dean Paul) were sung by Madame Emilia Conti at Æolian Hall on December 11.

Miss Norah Dawnay chose an exceptionally good programme for her recital at Bechstein Hall on December 12, and her interpretations were characterized by considerable skill and expressive power.

Vocal recitals have also been given by Miss Gertrude Tait (Æolian Hall, November 23), Miss Ena Rosenbusch (Bechstein Hall, November 26), Miss Evelyn White, who also claimed consideration as a pianist (Queen's Small Hall, December 1), Madame Geertruida Vogel (Bechstein Hall, December 8), Miss Jean Marriott (The Arts Centre, December 9), Madame Sylvia Gratama (Steinway Hall, December 11).

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

Mr. Norman Wilks, one of the most brilliant of our younger pianists, was heard at Bechstein Hall on November 21 in a Chopin recital, and again at the same hall on December 5. Two artists that deserve inclusion in the same category, namely Miss Norah Drewett and Miss Irene Scharrer, gave recitals on November 24 at Steinway and Bechstein Halls respectively.

On the same day one of the greatest living pianists, Herr Ernst von Dohnányi, was heard at Æolian Hall. The programme was mostly familiar, but such consummate playing is all too rare.

Mr. E. Howard-Jones appeared at Bechstein Hall on November 25 in an all-Beethoven programme, which he carried out admirably. Three Sonatas, the Thirty-two Variations, and two smaller works formed a scheme which few could undertake with such power and success.

Mr. John Powell's recital at Æolian Hall on November 25 was distinguished by the performance of his 'Sonata Teutonica,' an earnest musical dissertation on the text, 'The wages of sin is death.'

Mr. Ernest Schelling's pianoforte playing is always interesting. On December 9, at Queen's Hall, the interest was enhanced by the performance of a descriptive Suite by the Spanish composer, Granados, which proved of fascinating brilliance and colour. The four movements are entitled 'Goyescas.'

Pianoforte recitals have also been given by Miss Johanna Heymann (Hampstead Conservatoire, November 19); Miss Constance Keeping (Steinway Hall, November 25); Miss Rachel Dunn (Æolian Hall, November 26); Mr. Arthur Shattuck (Æolian Hall, December 2); Miss Adela Verne (Queen's Hall, December 3); M. Jascha Spivakovsky (Bechstein Hall, December 4); Miss Phyllis Emanuel (Æolian Hall, December 9); Miss Ethel Visick, a newcomer from South Africa (Æolian Hall, December 10); Mr. Alexander Raab (Queen's Hall, December 10); Mr. Frederic Lamond (Bechstein Hall, December 13); Mr. Vernon Warner (Æolian Hall, December 13); Count Charles de Souza (Steinway Hall, December 13).

Strauss's 'Don Juan,' and Brahms's second Symphony were performed by the students' orchestra at the Royal College of Music on December 12, under the direction of Sir Charles Stanford.

OTHER RECITALS AND CONCERTS.

A number of Mr. Herbert Goldstein's songs, some bearing considerable artistic value, were sung by his pupils at Æolian Hall on November 21.

Schubert's music supplied the programme of a concert given by Miss Janet Wheeler (pianist) at Steinway Hall on November 21. The B flat major Trio was given with the assistance of Miss Dorothy Bridson (violinist) and Señor Rubio (violoncellist), Mr. Robert Maitland gave songs, and Miss Wheeler played the Sonatas in C minor and A major.

Miss Phyllis Norman Parker's violin recital at Æolian Hall, on November 26, was distinguished by her excellent playing in Sonatas by Dohnányi and Saint-Saëns, and by the production of some well-written songs from her pen.

Madame Beatrice Langley included Mr. Cyril Scott's 'Tallahassee' Suite in the programme of her violin recital at Bechstein Hall on November 27.

The three Misses von Aranyi (violinists and pianist) and Miss Anna Grondal (vocalist) gave an interesting concert at Æolian Hall on November 27. Mr. F. S. Kelly conducted the string accompaniment to Miss Adila von Aranyi's admirable interpretation of Bach's Concerto in E major for violin.

A concert of her own compositions was given by Mrs. Amy Woodforde-Finden at Æolian Hall on December 2.

Mr. Mischa Elman gave a farewell recital at Queen's Hall on December 6 before a large audience, and again made an irresistible appeal with his universal power as a violinist. He has now started upon an American and Australian tour.

Mr. Herbert Oliver's new Song-cycle, 'The cries of London,' was produced at the Alhambra on Sunday evening, December 7. The London Symphony Orchestra and the National Sunday League Choir took part under Mr. Arthur Fagge, and Miss Carrie Tubb was soprano soloist.

Miss May Purcell and Mr. Christy Solari (vocalists) were the artists chiefly responsible for a varied programme at the new Philharmonic Hall on December 11.

A programme of particular interest was chosen by Mr. C. Carlyle for his concert at Bechstein Hall on December 15. It included unfamiliar vocal numbers of many periods, and represented present-day music with the famous Trio from 'Der Rosenkavalier.' A number of able singers took part.

Recitals have also been given by Mr. Frederic Fradkin, violinist (Æolian Hall, December 1), Miss Norah Read and Mr. A. Carvetti Read, vocalist and pianist (Bechstein Hall, December 1), Miss Josephine Airlie and Mr. Charles Mordaunt, siffleuse and vocalist (Steinway Hall, December 3), M. Wladimir Cernikoff and Mr. Darrell Fancourt, pianist and vocalist (Æolian Hall, December 5), Mlle. Jadwiga Wierzbicka and M. André de Ribapierre, pianist and violinist (Steinway Hall, December 8), Miss Kola Levien, violoncellist (Bechstein Hall, December 9), Miss Leila Doubleday, violinist (Bechstein Hall, December 11).

The Carnarvon Choral Society, which has won the distinction of a first-prize in the chief choral section of a National Eisteddfod, sang at the Central Hall, Westminster, on December 11. Mendelssohn's 'All men, all things,' and Elgar's 'Go, song of mine,' were among the choral works directed by Mr. John Williams. Miss Gwladys Roberts and Mr. Ben Davies were the vocal soloists of the evening.

An orchestral concert was given at Queen's Hall on December 12 by the Royal Academy of Music, under the direction of Sir Alexander Mackenzie. Some new works by Miss Morfydd Owen were produced. This institution gave its operatic performances at the Duke's Hall on December 3 and 4, when Mozart's 'Bastien and Bastienne' and the first and last Acts of Puccini's 'La Bohème,' were given with ability and happy spontaneity under Mr. Edgardo Lèvi's direction.

In our last issue it was noted that Dr. Harford Lloyd will retire at Easter from his post as music-master at Eton. We now have the pleasure of recording that Mr. Basil Johnson, the music-master of Rugby School, will succeed Dr. Lloyd. In our February number we shall give a sketch of Mr. Johnson's career, and a portrait.

Suburban Concerts.

Leoni's 'The Gate of Life' was performed to excellent effect on November 29 by the Ealing Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Mr. E. Victor Williams. Due warmth of expression was imparted to the choral singing, and the accompaniments were finely played by the orchestra. The programme further included the 'Miserere' from Verdi's 'Il Trovatore,' and Wagner excerpts. The solo-singers were Miss Laura Evans Williams, Mr. John Collett, and Mr. George Baker.

The new concert-version of Edward German's 'Tom Jones,' prepared by the composer, was brought to a first hearing on November 29 at the Crystal Palace by the Crystal Palace Orchestral Society and Choir. The soloists were Miss Agnes Christa, Miss Florence Barrow, Miss Maud Clough, Mr. Joseph Farrington, and Mr. Julien Henry. Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock conducted a spirited performance, which was much to the taste of the very large audience present.

The Dulwich Philharmonic Society gave an excellent concert at the Crystal Palace on December 6, under the direction of Mr. Martin Klickmann, their new conductor. The works performed were Brahms's 'German Requiem,' Mendelssohn's 'Loreley,' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens.' This exacting choral programme was carried out with creditable efficiency and power of expression. The orchestra gave good support, and the soloists were Miss Mary Lindsay and Mr. Joseph Farrington.

An admirable performance of Verdi's 'Requiem' was given by the Ealing Choral and Orchestral Society, at the Town Hall, on December 9. Under Mr. Albert Thompson's direction, vivid and appealing expression was thrown into the choral music. The remainder of the programme was devoted to Wagner. The soloists of the evening were Miss Carrie Tubbs, Miss Hayward Webb, Mr. Anderson Nicol, and Mr. Hamilton Harris.

The performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' given on December 10 by the Chiswick and Gunnersbury Philharmonic Society, in Chiswick Town Hall, at the first concert of their seventh season, may fitly be described as a triumph for all who took part. The choir and orchestra of over 160 gave of their best, especially in regard to the tone-quality of the voices and clear enunciation. The soloists—Miss Blodwen Lloyd, Mr. Hardy Williamson, and Mr. Jackson Potter—did full justice to the music allotted them, and Mr. David M. Davis ably conducted.

Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was effectively performed by the Bromley Choral Society, on December 10, under the able direction of Mr. Frederic Fertel. Good qualities of tone and expression were revealed in the choral singing, and an orchestra gave efficient support. The solo parts were taken by Miss Nora Rylance, Mr. Gwilym Richards, and Mr. George Uttley.

An interesting concert was given by the Orpheus Choral Society on December 18 at the Hampstead Conservatoire. Nicholas Gatty's 'Fly, envious time,' and Dr. Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on Christmas Carols were the principal works, which choir and orchestra performed creditably under Mr. Claud Powell's direction. Miss Dorothy Bridson played Bach's Violin concerto in E, and Mr. Courtenay Mostyn and Mr. Hubert Stutfield were the vocalists of the evening.

The Novello Choir, which is composed of the assistants of the firm of Novello & Co., and now consists of about 110 singers, gave a concert at the Duke's Hall (Royal Academy of Music) on December 13. The first two parts of Haydn's 'Creation,' and a miscellaneous selection, were performed. Dr. Alcock's 'Marche Triomphale,' for organ, was finely played by the composer. One of the most successful items was the song (with chorus), 'How shall I sing that Majesty,' which had been scored for orchestra for the occasion by Mr. John Pointer, the composer. The solo was sung by Miss Elaine Birch with fine spirit. The audience recognised the rhythmic vitality and stirring animation of the work by an insistent encore. The other solo singers were Mr. Roland Jackson and Mr. Frederick H. Grisewood. Mr. Harold Brooke showed firm control as conductor, and the excellent full orchestra engaged was led by Mr. Thomas Fussell.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BELFAST.

The Philharmonic's second concert was on November 28, when Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio' in abridged form was the pièce de résistance. The solo parts were sung by Miss Sara Silvers and Messrs. Webster Millar and Norman Allin. At this concert Miss Susanne Morvay, the brilliant young pianist, made her first appearance in Ireland, and obtained a veritable triumph. The choir and orchestra had given long and steady work to the preparation of their difficult tasks, and the result must have been very satisfactory to their talented conductor, Mr. E. Godfrey Brown. It certainly was so to the large and enthusiastic audience.

Dr. Lawrence Walker's second chamber concert took place on December 11, when Miss B. Spence (Glasgow), Miss W. Burnett (Belfast), and Mr. D. Millar Craig (Edinburgh), with Mr. F. H. Sawyer as pianist, took part in Schumann's Pianoforte quartet. Madame Gertrude Drinkwater was the vocalist, and Dr. Walker himself played with great skill and taste some of Debussy's 'Preludes.'

BIRMINGHAM.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society presented to their patrons at the Town Hall, on November 20, a deeply contrasted programme consisting of Sullivan's always welcome dramatic Cantata 'The Golden Legend,' and Sir Edward Elgar's 'The Music Makers': the one essentially a lyrical product of the latter part of the 19th century, and the other the outcome of the new creative art of our time. Dr. Sinclair, who conducted with his customary skill, realised in a complete manner the essential characteristics of Sullivan's picturesque and appealing score, choir and orchestra giving a performance of remarkable vitality and tone-colour which disarmed criticism. He was splendidly supported by the principal artists, Miss Carrie Tubbs, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. S. J. Coltham, and Mr. Herbert Brown, and assisted at the organ by Mr. C. W. Perkins.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company fulfilled a week's operatic season at the Alexandra Theatre, from November 17 to November 22, which proved a remarkable success, the house being crowded out each night.

The annual Scottish Concert promoted by the Birmingham and Midland Scottish Society, was held in the Town Hall on November 29, and as usual on such an occasion enthusiasm reigned supreme, every item on the programme being encored. It was the first time that the Glasgow Orpheus Choir, an admirable musical organization of forty select voices conducted and trained by Mr. Hugh S. Robertson, made their appearance at these functions. A perfect ensemble, artistic gradation of light and shade as well as expression, characterized their singing of well-chosen part-songs. Members of the choir also appeared as soloists. The second Harrison concert of the current series was given in the Town Hall on November 24, the artists being Miss Elena Gerhardt, Mr. John Coates, M. Eugène Ysaye (violin), Mr. Ernest Schelling (pianoforte), and Mr. R. J. Forbes (accompanist). The whole concert was one of the most artistic given by Mr. Percy Harrison for some time past.

Thanks to Messrs. Scotcher & Sons' enterprise, local audiences had an opportunity of hearing the Queen's Hall Orchestra at the Town Hall on December 1, conducted by Sir Henry Wood. The popular part of the Hall was crowded, but the high prices charged elsewhere were prohibitive. Those present had the advantage of hearing an exceptionally enjoyable concert. The programme was varied, and included Debussy's 'Fêtes,' Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung,' Dukas's 'L'apprenti Sorcier,' and Beethoven's Pianoforte concerto, 'The Emperor,' the soloist being Mr. Arthur Cooke.

The Midland Musical Society scored a great success with their splendid performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' Trilogy, given at the Town Hall on December 6, under Mr. A. J. Cotton's able conductorship. In point of ensemble, expression, and tone-colour it surpassed all previous interpretations of the work by this Society. The principal vocalists were Miss Marie Rowe, an excellent soprano, Mr. Ellis Vizard, and Mr. Herbert Simmonds.

The newly-formed Matthews's Birmingham Choir of fifty mixed voices gave their first concert of madrigals and part-songs, under Mr. Matthews's conductorship, in the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on December 8. The selection was an admirable one in every way, and for a new choral body the singing was exceptional in point of ensemble, tone-power, and phrasing, giving great promise for the future. Mr. Felix Salmond (violoncellist) and Mr. Clarence Raybould gave a fine performance of Brahms's Sonata in E minor.

Mr. W. J. Harris, who lately joined the staff of the Midland Institute School of Music as teacher of the pianoforte, gave a recital in the large Lecture Theatre of that Institute on December 10, and proved himself to be a scholarly and gifted pianist endowed with an excellent technique. The Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, so ably conducted by Mr. Julian Clifford, of the Harrogate Kursaal Orchestra, gave a concert in the Town Hall on December 13, when enjoyable performances were heard of Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' Overture, Tchaikovsky's Valse 'Eugène Onégin,' Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite, Coleridge-Taylor's Rhapsodic Dance 'Bamboula,' and Järnefeldt's popular 'Preludium.' The Hon. Mrs. Julian Clifford gave a dramatic reading of Max Bruch's 'Ave Maria' and Percy Fletcher's charming 'Valse Song.' Master Paul Beard (violinist) also contributed.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association gave a praiseworthy performance of Coleridge-Taylor's fine Cantata, 'A tale of Old Japan,' and Elgar's Choral Suite 'From the Bavarian Highlands,' under Mr. Joseph H. Adams's conductorship, at the Town Hall, on November 22. Choir and orchestra appeared to be on their mettle, realising quite an excellent ensemble in every way. Good work was done by the principals, Madame Walter Aston, Miss Florence England, Mr. Arnold Halstead, and Mr. Herbert Craymer.

BOURNEMOUTH.

Up to within recent times choral music has lagged far behind orchestral music in the artistic life of Bournemouth. Two years ago, however, it was decided, by the establishment of the Municipal Choir, to tackle the problem of choral music and make up the leeway that had been lost. At first, naturally enough, the new organization was nurtured with extreme care, and the wisdom of those who directed affairs was evident in their selecting such works for performance as would not unduly press upon a freshly formed body. But this winter, a proper feeling of ambition, which was justified by the earlier efforts, was allowed an outlet by means of a performance of Berlioz's 'Faust.' This notable, but very heavy, choral work came to a hearing on November 25, when it was found that the confidence reposed in the Choir was not misplaced. The performance was from every standpoint a splendid success, and it may be considered to have achieved the object of setting the Choir upon a substantial basis among those organizations that are benefiting the cause of choral music in this country. The unanimity, precision, and vigour of the singers, the magnificent playing of the Municipal Orchestra, and the authoritative and inspiring command of his forces which Mr. Dan Godfrey displayed, yielded not only great delight at the time but also abundant faith in the future of this enthusiastic body of singers. The soloists, Miss Ada Forrest, Mr. Alfred Heather, Mr. Charles Tree, and Mr. Constantine Morris, were an excellent quartet; nor must we omit a word of warm appreciation of the valuable services of Dr. Holloway, the choirmaster.

The Symphony concerts continue to be as successful as usual, the musical soundness of the programmes being particularly marked. Among the most enjoyable works performed, we would choose the following for remark: Glinka's 'Kamarinskaya,' Bantock's 'Overture to a Greek tragedy,' Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel,' T. F. Dunhill's Prelude, 'The King's threshold' (conducted by the composer); Glazounow's Symphony in B flat; Brahms's Symphony in F; Goldmark's 'Sappho' Overture; Percy Pitt's Serenade for small orchestra (conducted by the composer); and von Ahn Carse's new Variations (conducted by the composer). The following soloists have appeared with uniform success: Miss Nora Drewett (pianoforte), Mr. Felix Salmond (violoncello), Mr. Benno Moiseiwitsch (pianoforte), and Mr. Charles Fletcher, of Bournemouth (violin).

'One-composer' programmes have been in favour at the Monday 'Pops,' three concerts having been devoted to Tchaikovsky, Wagner, and Liszt, respectively. A 'National dances' programme on November 24 brought together some old favourites in three of Grieg's 'Norwegian Dances,' two of Dvorák's 'Slavonic Dances,' and Roger Quilter's 'Three English Dances,' amongst others.

Among miscellaneous events there has been a succession of good vocal recitals, a type of concert of very infrequent occurrence here. Mr. Plunket Greene, Dr. Theo. Lierhammer, and Mr. Theodore Byard are three singers imbued with a lofty and sincere artistic taste, and their respective recitals were a delight from beginning to end. Moriz Rosenthal shared the honours of the afternoon with Mr. Greene, his phenomenal technique completely subjugating the audience, and Mr. Byard was assisted by Mr. Anton Maaskoff, whose violin-playing was extremely pleasing. A recital was given by Madame Liza Lehmann, at which all the music was from her own pen. Mention must be made of the orchestral concert at which Miss Florence Macbeth and Mr. John Powell appeared, whereat the young soprano was vehemently acclaimed for her brilliant vocalisation. On December 3 Mr. Ernest Schelling appeared. Finally, reference must not be omitted concerning the concert given on December 9 by the distinguished violinist, Mr. Mischa Elman, assisted by the Municipal Orchestra.

BRISTOL AND DISTRICT.

The first concert of the seventh season of the Bristol Symphony Orchestra on November 20, at the Victoria Rooms, was well attended, and under the direction of Mr. Maurice Alexander a satisfactory rendering of César Franck's Symphony in D minor was performed. Mr. Robert Chignell's Prelude to 'Romeo and Juliet' was given under the direction of the composer, and other compositions in the programme were the Vorspiel to 'Parsifal,' Berlioz's 'Rákoczy' March, Mozart's 'Figaro' Overture, and the Valse from the Suite, Tchaikovsky's 'Sleeping beauty.' Mr. Chignell was the vocalist.

On November 24 the Clifton Quintet gave a concert at the Victoria Rooms, the players being Messrs. Herbert Parsons (pianoforte), Maurice Alexander and Edgar Hawke (violins), Alfred Best (viola), and Percy Lewis (violoncello). Fine performances were given of Mozart's Quartet in C, and Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte trio in A minor (Op. 50).

Bristol Musical Society on November 29 held their winter concert at the Victoria Rooms, under the direction of Mr. C. W. Stear. Choir and band numbered 300, Mr. F. S. Gardner being the leader. The principal vocalists were Miss Mary Leighton, Miss Maud Wright, and Mr. Joseph Reed. Puget's 'Ulysses and the Sirens' was performed for the first time in the provinces and met with a gratifying reception. Stanford's 'Phaëdra Crohoore' and a miscellaneous selection were other features of the concert.

Dr. Norman Sprankling delighted a large audience at the Victoria Rooms on December 4 with a pianoforte recital of compositions by Russian musicians.

There was a large attendance at the Victoria Rooms on December 8, when Mr. Hubert Hunt gave an excellent chamber concert. Those who took part were Mr. Hunt and Miss Avice Sealy (violins), Miss Gladys Home and Miss Hilda Barr (violas), Mr. Roger Bucknall (violoncello), and Dr. H. Walford Davies (pianoforte).

Bristol New Philharmonic Society on December 10 gave their first concert for the thirteenth season at the Victoria Rooms under the direction of Mr. Arnold Barter. The principal vocalists were Miss Emily Breare and Mr. Campbell McInnes. The orchestra was led by Mr. Harold Bernard. 'A Sea Symphony,' by Dr. R. Vaughan Williams, was effectively interpreted, after which a miscellaneous selection was given.

On December 13, West Bristol Choral Society at the Victoria Rooms gave a creditable performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf,' under the direction of Mr. Charles Read. The soloists were Madame Alice Boaden, Mr. R. Hoare Byers, and Mr. Herbert Tracey. A small but competent orchestra was led by Mr. Maurice Alexander.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

Few choral events have to be recorded, enterprise in this direction at the Three Towns being slack. The Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir, conducted by Mr. David Parkes, sang several pieces from their repertoire, on November 26, at a concert organized for railwaymen's benevolent funds. Solo vocal and instrumental items were provided by Miss Winifred Blight (violinello), Misses Nellie Jordan and Emily Sutton, and Mr. W. Strawbridge. A concert-performance of 'Cavalleria Rusticana' was given by the Guildhall Choir with orchestra, conducted by the borough organist, on November 29, the principals being Miss Emily Breare, Miss Maude Wingfield, Mr. Edward Davies, and Mr. Robert Chignell.

An increased number of subscribers provided a good house at the fifteenth Symphony concert of Dr. Weekes's Orchestral Society on November 19. The players were overweighted in a Wagner selection consisting of three excerpts from 'Die Meistersinger' and the 'Rhine Journey.' The Symphony was Haydn in D, No. 2. Miss Myrtle Ross sang, and Mrs. Arthur Picken declaimed Grieg's 'Bergliot,' with the band. The conductors were Dr. Weekes and Mr. Walter Weekes. Mr. Percy Grainger came on December 3 for the second musical matinee of the series planned by the Misses Smith; but his programme did not include any work of serious classical importance in pianoforte art to balance the list of light, topical and characteristic pieces with the origin of which he was himself more or less associated. Madame Amy Dewhurst was the vocalist. The violinist, Melsa, made a good impression on his first visit to Plymouth on December 5, his clever and temperamental playing giving genuine pleasure.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

After a long interval a choral Society has been revived at Dawlish, with Mr. J. F. King as conductor. Part-songs and glees were sung on November 24 by the Barnstaple Music Festival Society in a manner which reflected credit on themselves and their conductor, Dr. H. J. Edwards, Lloyd's eight-part chorus, 'To Morning,' and Stewart's 'The bells of St. Michael's tower' being particularly well sung. Special value was given to a missionary effort at Torquay on December 2 by the singing of a Cantata, 'The dawn of light,' by girls' voices, conducted by Misses Worsfold and Rasbotham; and another Cantata, of like significance, 'Christ and the children of China,' was sung by a choir of eighty voices at Ilfracombe on December 4, with Miss Ivy Pugsley as conductor. 'The Creation' was performed by Kingsbridge Choral Society on December 4, with a band of twenty. The choir numbered eighty, and sang with good spirit and sense of pitch and rhythm. The principals were Miss Doris Montrave and Messrs. Sydney Coltham and W. H. Bullock. Mr. Arthur Harris conducted. Ottery St. Mary Church Choir combined with Ottery Choral Society on December 10 to sing Mozart's Requiem Mass in the Parish Church, conducted by Mr. Stanley Chipperfield, organist.

It was inevitable that the unsatisfactory condition of things choral in Exeter should this season find a working level, and that has been supplied by the further amalgamation of the Exeter Choral Society (conductor, Mr. Allan Allen) with the already amalgamated Exeter Oratorio Society and the Western Counties' Choral Association. The combination has produced a choir of 250 voices that will be known as the Exeter Oratorio Society, thus perpetuating the name of the oldest of the three organizations. The three conductors will collaborate—Dr. D. J. Wood, Dr. H. J. Edwards, and Mr. Allan Allen, the last-named acting also as chorus-master. The first performance under the new conditions took place on December 10, 'The Messiah' being the work. The choral singing was quite the best that has been heard in Exeter within recent memory, and suggested many fine possibilities for the future. On the same evening, not far away, the excellent Choral Society at Exmouth, whose aims and achievements are always of high standard, sang 'A tale of Old Japan' and 'Merrie England,' under their conscientious conductor, Mr. Raymond Wilmot.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 was the chief number in the autumn programme of the Teignmouth Orchestral Society played on December 11, under the baton of Mr. A. J. James.

Dr. Wood's Exeter Orchestral Society confined their programme on December 18 to string numbers, but even so found much to interest the audience. Bantock's Suite 'In the far West' was a novelty, and contrasted strongly with a 'Petite Scène—Souvenirs lointaines' by Gabriel-Marie, a 'Romance Bohémienne' by Boldie, and a 'Rigaudon de Dardanus' by Rameau. Miss Beatrice Spencer was the vocalist, and Mr. C. G. Pike solo violoncellist.

Recital lectures on Celtic and English songs were given at Exmouth on December 11 and December 18, by Mr. W. Fothergill Robinson, who also supplied vocal illustrations. On December 11 a new organ was opened in Tavistock United Methodist Church by Mr. George Hele, jun. Mr. Mischa Elman gave a recital at Exeter on November 18, with pianoforte, and then proceeded to Torquay, where on the next day he performed with the Municipal Orchestra. The concerts given in the Torquay Pavilion by this municipal organization and their conductor, Mr. Basil Hindenberg, have always been of high standard, and the weekly programme tends to higher elevation both in matter and manner. A symphony concert is given each Wednesday; one-composer and characteristic programmes are frequently arranged; visits of prominent artists (Melsa, Isolde Menges, and vocal 'stars') are secured each week; and the band has gained a high reputation for artistic playing and interpretation.

CORNWALL.

A very good impression was made on November 26 by the newly-formed Helston Male Choir, when they sang several pieces under the conductorship of Mr. A. E. Goodman. Spohr's 'The Last Judgment' was sung by Redruth United Methodist Choir, augmented with orchestra to 150 performers. Mr. M. Clements, director, obtained some excellent work from the Choir, their singing being sure in time and note, and bright and expressive in tone. The principals were Miss Maria Yelland, Madame Lillian Langdon, and Messrs. J. Farrington, J. K. White, and C. G. Pike. The annual Festival of St. Mary's Wesleyan Choir, Truro, on December 4, consisted of part-singing which was given with purity of tone and delicacy of expression, Mr. J. H. Williams conducting.

DUBLIN.

The Orchestral Society gave their fourth concert on November 26. The chief numbers on the programme were Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' and Brahms's Violin concerto, in which Signor Simonetti was the soloist. At the fifth concert, on November 17, the programme included Beethoven's second Symphony and the new Pianoforte concerto by the conductor of the Society, Dr. Esposito, who played the solo part. This work was written for the 1913-14 I.S.M. Conference in London.

At the Royal Dublin Society recitals have been given by the London String Quartet, who played works by Tchaikovsky, Op. 11, Beethoven, Op. 18, No. 4, and Schubert, Op. 29; Dr. Percy Buck, who gave an afternoon of organ music; and the Wessely Quartet, who gave Quartets by Mozart, in B flat, Sgambati, Op. 17, and Glière, Op. 20.

Excellent programmes, including Mozart's G minor Symphony, Beethoven's eighth Symphony, and Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, have been given at the Sunday Orchestral Concerts, and a number of able soloists have appeared.

EDINBURGH.

The Beecham-Denhof Operatic Festival has come and gone, and Edinburgh has the satisfaction of knowing that its support was satisfactory. The programme was the same as at other cities. One might mention the excellent audiences at the revival of Gluck's 'Orfeo' and the first performance of Debussy's 'Pelleas and Melisande.' From an artistic point of view Miss Beryl Freeman's Melisande left little to be desired; her artistry and restraint were remarkable. It is quite unnecessary to enumerate the artists, as they have been commented on at length in these columns by other correspondents.

On October 19, the Amateur Orchestral Society under Mr. Collinson introduced to Edinburgh Brahms's Rhapsody for alto-solo, male choir, and orchestra. Miss Bonnar was the vocalist. A Concerto for flute, harp, and orchestra by Mozart was another notable contribution at this concert. This Society does much to encourage local talent. A Concert-overture by Mr. Charles O'Brien,—a local musician who is devoting much time to composition—is announced for performance at a future concert this season.

October 23 brought Dr. Henschel back again as conductor at the Orchestral Concerts. The concert was devoted entirely to Symphonies: Mozart's No. 38, Haydn's No. 12, and Beethoven's No. 7. On October 30, at the same concert, we had Bantock's 'Fifine at the fair,' and on December 8, Ravel's 'Mother Goose' Suite, both for the first time. On December 18, Delius's Impression 'In a garden' was the novelty, and Lenghi-Cellini, tenor, paid his first visit to the Capital.

The Classical Concerts had M. Thibaud, assisted by M. André Mangeot and Mr. Arnold Smith, on December 2, in a delightful recital of violin duets. Judging from this recital, Handel and Bach would seem to be coming into their own as 'emotional' composers. The fifth concert of this series was devoted to a Lieder recital by Miss Julia Culp on December 13. She seems to improve as the years go by, if that be possible. M. Achille Rivarde was violinist, and Herr Coenraad van Bos accompanied. On the same evening Glasgow Orpheus Choir, with Mr. Robertson conducting, and Mr. Robert Burnett as vocalist, gave a Scotch concert. A feature of this concert was modern arrangements of old melodies by Granville Bantock, Vaughan Williams, John E. West, and Purcell Mansfield. 'The Death Croon,' by Bantock, is a wonderful piece of atmospheric writing. The choir sang with excellent tone throughout, and with wonderful imagination—altogether refreshing. It is to be hoped the concert will be a stimulus to the many choristers and choirmasters present.

On December 12 Mr. Arthur de Greef gave a pianoforte recital of classics. He appeared on December 8 at the orchestral concert in the 'Emperor' Concerto of Beethoven. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Beswick gave a delightful programme of duets for pianoforte on December 9.

A College of Music for Scotland is at present being discussed by a committee of the Town Council as a business proposition. A meeting of citizens on October 23 was convened by the Lord Provost to consider the matter, and this led to the formation of the above-mentioned committee.

GLASGOW.

The St. Petersburg Quartet made a welcome reappearance at Mr. A. M. Henderson's second Chamber concert, on November 20, playing Quartets by Schumann and Glazounoff and, with Mr. Henderson at the pianoforte, Brahms's Quintet in F minor. The charming duet-singing of Madame Saima Neovi and Miss Ellen Beck was a novel and delightful feature of the Saturday Popular Orchestral Concert on November 22. The first choral concert of the season took place on November 26, when the Choral Union, under Mr. Henri Verbrugghen, presented Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and, for the first time in Scotland, Walford Davies's 'Song of St. Francis,' and Bach's 'Sing ye to the Lord.' The task proved too great a one for the Union, and the performance of all three works left much to be desired. The soloists were Misses Dorothy Silk and Doris Woodall, and Messrs. Gwynne Davies and Montague Borwell. The programme of the fourth Classical concert, on December 2, included Beethoven's seventh Symphony and Bantock's Orchestral drama 'Fifine at the fair.' The latter work, given for the first time here, was brilliantly played by the Scottish Orchestra, and was received by the audience with unmistakable signs of favour. The popularity of the Glasgow Orpheus Choir (Mr. H. S. Robertson, conductor) was evidenced at their concert on December 4 by the attendance of an audience which filled every available inch of space in St. Andrew's Hall, and even overflowed to the platform itself. The programme consisted almost entirely of choral arrangements of Scottish songs by Bantock, P. J. Mansfield, John Cullen, &c. The singing of the Choir throughout was beyond reproach. Special mention must be made of the first performance of Bantock's arrangement of 'The Death Croon,' from Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser's 'Songs of the Hebrides.' In this arrangement, which is the finest we have had from Mr. Bantock, the melody and words are given to the alto part, the other parts giving the atmosphere by humming a skilfully devised polyphony. It makes the highest demands on the technical and interpretative powers of a choir, and these the Orpheus Choir under Mr. Robertson fully satisfied. Madame Kirkby Lunn, as solo vocalist, sang Loewe's Ballad 'Edward,' and some Scottish songs.

Mr. Benno Moiseiwitsch was soloist at the fifth Classical concert on December 9, and gave a brilliant performance of Schumann's Pianoforte concerto in A minor. The programme also included Maurice Ravel's Suite for orchestra, 'Mother Goose,' which was given for the first time here.

The recently re-organized Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society made a successful first public appearance on December 11. The band numbers seventy performers, and has the distinction of possessing a practically complete amateur wind section. A wisely-selected programme which did not provoke comparison with professional bands was presented, and consequently the Orchestra's performance reached a good standard. Mr. H. W. Cole was conductor, and Mr. Lewys James solo vocalist.

Under the skilful guidance of Mr. J. M. Diack, the Bach Choir gave, with their clear enunciation and intelligent phrasing, an abridged version of the 'Christmas Oratorio,' in St. Mary's Cathedral, on December 15. The soloists were Misses Jean Syson and Isabel Wilkie, and Messrs. G. H. Martin and H. McNeilly. Mr. George T. Pattman's artistic organ accompaniments contributed in no small degree to the success of the concert. The sixth Classical concert, on December 16, took the form of a Verdi centenary celebration, when the Choral Union, under M. Mlynarski, gave an excellent performance of the 'Manzoni' Requiem. The solo music was in the efficient hands of Miss Antonia Dolores, Miss Mildred Jones, Signor Lenghi-Cellini, and Mr. F. Ranalow.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

Sir Frederic Cowen conducted the fourth concert of the Philharmonic Society on November 25, and secured an impressive performance of Beethoven's C minor Symphony. Two young artists, Miss Florence Macbeth (vocalist) and Miss Isolde Menges (violinist), made their first appearance here with great success. A brilliant concert included the singing of Edward German's melodious part-songs, 'Sleeping' and 'My bonnie lass,' which had been prepared by Mr. Harry Evans.

The fifth Philharmonic Concert on December 9 was devoted to French music, conducted by M. Gabriel Pierné, whose clever Overture, 'Ramuntcho,' constructed on Basque popular airs, was an outstanding item of the programme. Another was Debussy's 'L'après-midi d'un faune.' The Symphony No. 3, by André Gédalge, failed to make any deep impression. The workmanship is undeniably skilful, but the interest is not sustained. The 'Carneval Romain' Overture of Berlioz, César Franck's 'Le Chasseur Maudit,' and the singing of Signor Lenghi-Cellini added to, and varied, the interest. Mr. Harry Evans made a great feature of the choir's performance of Debussy's part-song 'Cold Winter, villain that thou art.'

The concert of the Hallé Orchestra conducted by Mr. Balling on November 22 was chiefly notable for the fine performance of Strauss's 'Also sprach Zarathustra.' Otherwise the programme was not compelling in its attraction, and it was a mistake to include the C minor Symphony in view of its performance by the Philharmonic Orchestra on the following Tuesday.

There was a far better attendance at the Philharmonic Hall on November 26, when Mr. Percy Harrison relied, and not in vain, on the attraction of a programme sustained by such artists as Miss Elena Gerhardt, Mr. John Coates, M. Eugene Ysàye, and Mr. Ernest Schelling (solo pianoforte), with Mr. R. J. Forbes, most able and sympathetic of accompanists.

Madame Kirkby Lunn sang with great success at the third concert of the Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra on December 2, when the programme was devoted to a chronological selection of Wagner Overtures, beginning with 'Rienzi' and ending with 'Parsifal,' in which the augmented orchestra, conducted by Mr. Akeroyd, was heard to advantage.

The local Catholic community is not adequately supporting its excellent Catholic Philharmonic Society, to judge by the poor attendance at their concert on December 1. The conductor, Mr. H. P. Allen, is to be congratulated upon the state of efficiency to which he has brought the choir of 150 voices, of which two-thirds belong to the sopranos and contraltos. The singing is marked by agreeable features of tone and expression, shown in the performance with orchestra of Elgar's six choral songs 'From the Bavarian Highlands,' and also in Percy Fletcher's Choral Fantasia on Wagner's 'Die Meistersinger.' The programme also contained Mozart's Violin concerto in A, well played by Mr. Arthur Catterall. The vocalist was Miss Dorothy Silk. Mozart's 'Requiem' will be sung at the next concert in March.

At the Rodewald Club's fourth concert on November 24, the Rawdon Briggs Quartet (in which the pianist is Mr. Max Meyer) performed Quartets by Saint-Saëns and Brahms, and also Max Reger's charming Trio in A minor for violin, viola, and violoncello. At the meeting on December 8 there was a large audience to hear Mr. Plunket Greene's 'Lecture on Songs and their Classification,' assisted by Mr. S. Liddle at the pianoforte.

The features of the second Brodsky Quartet concert on November 27 were the performances of Mozart's Quartet in D and (with Mr. S. Rawdon Briggs and Miss Mary McCullagh as second viola and violoncello) Brahms's Sextet in G.

The Societa Armonica, conducted by Mr. V. Akeroyd played an interesting programme on December 6 which contained Dvorak's beautiful Symphony in G, and Debussy's 'Petite Suite,' originally written for pianoforte duet and effectively orchestrated by Henri Blüsser. An expressive and masterful performance of the solo part in Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto was given by M. Zacharewitsch, and Miss Edith Evans's singing was on an equally high artistic plane.

Cheshire Choral Societies have lately been showing activity, and on December 15 the Port Sunlight Philharmonic and Orchestral Society performed Barnett's 'The Ancient Mariner,' conducted by Mr. Seddon. On December 18, Mr. Appleyard's Cloughton 'St. Cecilia' Society sang 'Elijah' to pianoforte accompaniment. More enterprising is the method of the St. Stephen's (Preston) Society, conducted by Mr. C. E. Stewart, which combined with the Rock Ferry Alban Orchestra in a performance of Parry's 'Pied Piper' on December 15. On the same evening, Handel's 'Saul' was the principal feature of the concert given by the St. John's Choral Society, Egremont, the band and choir being conducted by Mr. W. Biller.

The Cloughton Male-Voice Choir of seventy-five voices, conducted by Mr. Tom Lloyd, upheld their reputation on December 10 by an exhibition of fine tone and training in Cyril Jenkins's dramatic chorus 'Fallen heroes' and Protheroe's 'The Crusaders.' Another excellent male-voice combination, the Wallasey Gentlemen's Glee Club, of sixty voices, conducted by Mr. Wilfrid Shaw, gave pleasure by their admirable glee and part-song singing at their concert on November 26. There is opportunity for a more extended cultivation of this delightful branch of choral art on the Lancashire side of the river. Its possibilities were exemplified at the concert given in the Sun Hall on December 6 by the famous Liverpool Village Choir, of eighty female voices, conducted by Mr. R. T. Edwards, and the well-known Southport Vocal Union, of fifty male voices, conducted by Mr. J. C. Clarke.

An interesting feature of the performance of the 'Messiah' by the West Kirby Choral Society, on December 16, was the participation of neighbouring church choirs of all denominations, to whom Dr. Brierley, the conductor, had extended an invitation to join the central chorus. It was a happy idea, which resulted as happily. The vocal principals were Miss Edith McCullagh, Miss Cragg-James, Mr. Hempsall, and Mr. S. Mann.

Mr. Harry Evans gave a lucid and instructive address on 'The Modern Development of Choral Music' to the local section of the I.S.M. at the Royal Institution on December 13. He illustrated on the pianoforte the immense development in recent years of the harmonic structure of choral music as exemplified by a comparison of Barnby's 'Sweet and low,' and Cornelius's 'O Death, thou art the tranquil night.' In addition to being good 'sight-readers,' modern choralists must be able to sing into the harmony of the music. Choristers used to depend upon seeing rather than hearing. That must be reversed. Mr. Evans paid a tribute to Sir Hubert Parry for bringing into his choral music the literary quality—a combination of verbal and musical accent and perfect declamation. The experiments and achievements of Sir Edward Elgar and Prof. Bantock were discussed, and Mr. Evans explained how music of the atmospheric quality of Debussy's Nocturnes was best rehearsed. 'The art of conducting also came under notice from the days when a conductor was most valued on account of his 'good heavy down-beat' down to the very different ideals of to-day.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The first half of the Hallé season has revealed only too clearly the continued decline in support, which I have noted from time to time. At the beginning of December there appeared an advertisement in the Manchester Guardian for the disposal of four stall-seats for the remainder of the season, accompanied by the ominous legend, 'no reasonable offer refused.' The whole affair had an ugly look. But although late in the day, efforts at a resuscitation of interest are being made, fifty or sixty ladies, already subscribers, being engaged in recruiting additional ones. Balling encouraged them in a letter voicing the opinion that 'the time we live in is a hard one for the Muses, they have to stand rather in the background at present'; and he added, 'I earnestly think that the only way to get over that miserable state of things is for the women to make up their minds to help.'

Mrs. Maberley (daughter of Sir Charles Hallé, the founder of the concerts) reinforced the appeal: 'To bring good music, the best music, to the knowledge of the people was the aim of all his life,' and she told how a grateful operative sent to the old conductor a clumsy parcel enclosing a couple of yards of flannel in appreciation of an 'Elijah' performance of the previous day; and Cardinal Vaughan was reported by her to have said of Hallé that he was 'preaching to the people a far better sermon than ever I preached.' But as showing the tremendous inroads which increasing social engagements have made in recent years, the total subscription list to-day is only 430 as against 900 in its palmy days. Nothing could more eloquently express the need for action on the part of the executive than that simple comparison. The only comment is 'Why in the world were not remedial measures taken in the closing years of Richter's conductorship?' However, better late than never, and perseverance may yet put a much better face on Hallé matters. From recent disclosures, Lancashire County Cricket, no less than the best drama (as exemplified in Miss Horniman's Gaiety Theatre) would appear to be passing through quite as critical a period financially as the Hallé concerts.

In writing last month of the proposed Municipal concerts by the Hallé Orchestra, I said the main difficulty would be in ensuring the presence of the right class of working-man music-lover. With how little wisdom is this world governed! The Town Hall folks fixed the hours from 9 to 11 in the morning as the most suitable period for the working-man to buy concert tickets! Somehow, 1,000 tickets were cleared in two hours, a batch of 200 going to the Ancots Brotherhood. The demand is said to have surprised the municipal authorities, and the Lord Mayor's naive comment was, 'the experience will be useful for the future' (!). A fortnight before the date fixed for the first concert there was talk of transferring the venue to the larger Free Trade Hall, but I imagine unexpected difficulties of a technical nature would stand in the way of such procedure.

At the annual meeting of the Royal Manchester College of Music, the balance sheet showed a deficit on the year's working of £198.

It is deserving of wide publicity that in eleven years the College has received no less than £1,747 from the Brodsky Quartet Concerts, to be devoted to the Students' Sustentation Fund.

The second Brodsky Quartet concert enabled us to welcome to Manchester the daughter of the late William H. Dayas, to whose supreme gifts as a teacher testimony was borne by an enthusiastic group of his former pupils. Miss Karin Dayas took the pianoforte part in Brahms's F minor Quartet with distinction. At the 'evening social' of the College Club she played much uncommon pianoforte music by Debussy, Balakireff, and Weissmann. The Brodsky Quartet in recent years have not advanced to a richer technical mastery, but they have gained enormously as an interpretative medium by their long, unbroken association, and to hear them at their greatest one must be present when they play the later Beethoven Quartets—in the C sharp minor for choice.

Max Reger's E minor Trio (Op. 102) is strong enough meat for most hardened musicians, but the Ancoats Brotherhood audiences are well up in advanced music, and the Manchester Trio (Isaacs, Catterall, and Fuchs) roused in them the enthusiasms one only finds in audiences of right-down-keen music-lovers—no dilettantes journey out to the wastes of Ancoats.

The Edith Robinson Quartet on December 8 gave us for the first time Bruckner's String quintet, and, most beautiful of all, they supported Mr. Francis Harford in the Bach Cantata 'Ich habe genug,' composed for the Feast of the Purification, with accompaniment of strings and oboe. The figured bass was filled in on the pianoforte by Mr. Charles Riseigari. It would be very hard to name a dozen really good English Bach singers, but Harford would be in the list.

Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Merrick gave a recital of music for two pianofortes, when the works were not only unfamiliar but the composers' names were withheld in order to give the music greater freedom to make its appeal, yet with no idea of mystifying the hearer. Of course one may derive added stimulus to pure enjoyment from endeavours to 'spot' the composers. A fortnight later, there appeared in the advertisement columns of the Manchester Guardian, 'Hope Squire and Frank Merrick beg to announce that the three items presented at their recent concert were by Reger, Schubert, and Delius. The Reger Duet has not previously been played in England.' Plébisitary programmes are common up North; before long we may find 'Tango teas' displaced in popular favour by the unwonted excitements of pianoforte and violin recitals where guessing forms take the place of annotated programmes.

The second Harrison Concert, on November 25, proved to be an uncommonly interesting Liederabend by Gerhardt and Mr. John Coates, M. Ysäe and Mr. Ernest Schelling contriving by their masterful playing of Bach and Veracini to give a certain needed austerity to the programme.

In orchestral music the past month has been prolific in new, or almost new, and interesting works. Elgar's 'Falstaff' and Violin concerto claim first consideration. Heard at an interval of only a week the advance revealed in 'Falstaff' was most clearly defined. It cannot be said that Brodsky displayed particular affinity for the subtle eloquent style of the Concerto, although he played admirably.

Elgar will have to wait, perhaps longer than Strauss, for a full measure of appreciation of all that lies embedded in the score of 'Falstaff'; his graphic powers do not illuminate his subject for us at the first or early hearings with anything like Strauss's intensity. Historically he demands of his audience a mental readjustment as to Falstaff's character; once this obstacle is overcome, much that is obscure becomes clear as the day. Balling and his forces had worked hard in its preparation; the conversational aspect of the opening section had hardly sufficient freedom to make its full effect, but the gallant Prince Hal theme stood forth with unusual brilliance, owing to the exceptional sonority of the bass string section of this orchestra. The Eastcheap episode glittered and dazzled by the amazing audacity of its orchestration. With the stertorous tones of Falstaff's broken sleep and the ensuing dreamland-picture the audience felt on surer ground, and thenceforward the work may be said to have been fully grasped, the orchard episode and the gorgeous pageantry of the Westminster section leading naturally and inevitably to the solemnity and pathos of the closing scene. It may be hoped that Elgar's Concerto, second Symphony, and 'Falstaff' will become as familiar in the next few years as 'Gerontius.' We shall not love the earlier work any the less, but we shall be compelled to acknowledge that the later works stand as high among symphonies as 'Gerontius' among choral works.

Bantock's 'Helena' Variations were given at this same Hallé concert (November 27), and here Balling displayed a remarkable affinity for such a type of work, and his playing set the score in a most favourable light.

Three very remarkable solo features stand out vividly in the recollections of the last month: Madame Ackté, in Strauss songs with pianoforte accompaniment (in which she 'swamped' the player); M. Lamond's performance on December 11, in the Tchaikovsky Concerto at Hallé's; and Mr. Frank Mullings's singing at the aforementioned Bantock concert, when he typified the exultant hero of Browning's 'Fërishtah's Fancies.'

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

On November 26, the Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union gave their first subscription concert with the Scottish Orchestra in the Town Hall. Dr. Walford Davies conducted the first part of the programme, and obtained fine performances of his Orchestral suite, 'After Wordsworth,' and his Cantata, 'The Song of St. Francis.' The first charmed everyone by its spontaneity, and the latter by its picturesque writing, a happy combination of serious purpose and dramatic power. The soloists were Miss Dorothy Silk, Madame Doris Woodall, Mr. Gwynne Davies, and Mr. Montague Borwell. Both works made a profound impression on the audience. Dr. Coward concluded the concert with a performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise.'

On Wednesday, December 17, the annual performance of Handel's 'Messiah' was given by the same Society with Miss Dorothy Silk, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Hardy Williamson, and Mr. Robert Radford as soloists. Dr. Coward conducted, and the choir sang superbly. There was a local orchestra led by Mr. Alfred Wall. Mr. W. G. Whittaker has been appointed assistant-conductor to the Society for the present season.

On December 9 the Sunderland Philharmonic Society gave excellent performances of Dvorák's 'The Spectre's Bride' and Bantock's 'Time Spirit.' The soloists were Miss Mabel Manson, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Ivor Foster. The Leeds Symphony Orchestra provided the accompaniments, and Mr. Kilburn conducted.

On December 10 the Darlington Choral and Orchestral Society gave a Madrigal concert in the Mechanics' Hall. The principal works in the programme were Dowland's 'Awake, sweet love,' Morley's 'Now is the month of maying,' Gibbons's 'Silver swan,' Bennett's 'Flow, O my tears,' Elgar's 'Weary wind of the West,' and a fine part-song of Stanford's entitled 'The Witch.' Well-chosen solos were contributed by Mr. Clive Carey (vocalist), Mr. James Winram (violinist), and Miss Dora Gilson (pianist). Mr. T. Henderson conducted.

On December 11 the Middlesbrough Musical Union gave a performance of Max Bruch's 'Fair Ellen' and Lloyd's 'Hero and Leander,' with Miss Mabel Manson, Mr. Ivor Foster, and the Leeds Symphony Orchestra. Both works were particularly well done, 'Hero and Leander' being received with special favour. Mr. N. Kilburn conducted. On the same evening the Stockton and Thornaby Choral and Orchestral Society gave a performance of Bizet's 'Carmen,' under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Wilson. The outstanding feature of the concert was the brilliant singing of Miss Phyllis Archibald in the title-rôle.

On December 10 the Saltburn Choral Society, under Mr. W. H. Boynes, gave German's 'Merrie England'; and the Redcar Choral Society, conducted by Mr. R. G. Thompson, gave Cowen's 'The Rose Maiden.'

The Newcastle Harmonic Society, conducted by Mr. Edgar L. Bainton, selected Handel's 'Judas Maccabæus' for their first concert, and secured an excellent performance in the Town Hall on December 10. The soloists were the Hon. Mrs. Julian Clifford, Miss Lottie Beaumont, Mr. Arthur Jordan, and Mr. William Coleman. Mr. H. Yeaman Dodds was organist.

An interesting concert was given by the choir of the Elswick Road Wesleyan Church on Wednesday, December 3, when a new Cantata entitled 'Eastward,' by Mr. Alfred Wall, was given for the first time at Newcastle. The work is well written for both choir and orchestra, and was received with enthusiasm by the large audience. Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch' was given at the same concert, and on the previous Sunday the choir had given Bennett's 'Woman of Samaria.' Mr. George Dodds, organist and choirmaster of the Church, conducted, and Mr. H. Yeaman Dodds was at the organ.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

A successful performance of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' was given by the united efforts of the Retford Amateur Musical Society and the Retford Orchestral Society on November 26. The solos were undertaken by Miss Marion Perrott, Mrs. Basil Ross, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Joseph Farrington. The results were artistically satisfactory, and great credit is due to the conductor, Mr. John Smith.

After a lapse of some years, Nottingham again enjoyed the privilege of having a chamber concert given by Miss Cantelo. It is to be hoped that the encouragement of a large audience will tend to the repetition or continuance of these invaluable opportunities. A programme of Bach, Beethoven, and Schumann was admirably carried out by Miss Cantelo and Dr. Brodsky's Quartet, whose playing was most keenly appreciated.

The Borrowash Choral Society gave their ninth season's concert on December 1, the chief feature being the performance of Stanford's 'The Revenge.' Vocal solos were given by Mr. Lacey Parker, of Derby, and violin solos by Mr. W. Pannell.

The programme of the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society's Orchestral Concert on December 4 was decidedly popular in character, Brahms's 'Hungarian Dances,' Mendelssohn's 'Spring Song' and 'Bees' Wedding,' Grainger's 'Mock Morris,' and Berlioz's March from 'Faust' proving welcome items, whilst Elgar's 'Cockaigne' Overture and Dvorák's Symphony No. 4, in G, were heartily appreciated by an enthusiastic audience. The solo artists were Miss Lily Crawforth (vocalist) and Mr. Wynn Reeves (violinist). Mr. Allen Gill conducted.

On November 30, the Albert Hall Choir gave a performance of Spohr's 'Last Judgment,' under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill, with Mr. Bernard Johnson at the organ.

OXFORD.

The first concert of the term took place in the Masonic Hall on October 23, when Mr. A. J. Slowcombe and his party gave an excellent chamber concert, the principal numbers being Beethoven's first 'Rassoumofsky' Quartet, and Schubert's Trio in B flat, Op. 99. Later in the term another successful concert was given by the same party.

On October 30 the first of a series of four classical concerts arranged by Messrs. Acott & Co. took place in the Town Hall, when the Paris 'Gelos' Quartet, under the leadership of M. Albert Geloso, gave a very delightful concert, the programme consisting of César Franck's Quartet in D minor, Beethoven's in B flat, Op. 18, No. 6, and Debussy's in G minor, Op. 10. There was always a perfect balance of tone, united with beauty of finish, the players receiving quite an ovation at the conclusion of the concert. On November 4 Pachmann gave another 'farewell' concert in the Town Hall to a crowded house. It is sufficient to say that he played as charmingly as ever.

On November 7 Mr. Plunket Greene and Herr Rosenthal gave in the Town Hall another of their pianoforte and vocal recitals with which we are now familiar.

From November 17 to 22 Herr Moritz Wurms and his orchestra occupied the Town Hall, giving two performances each day, and playing admirably.

On November 26 came the second 'Acott' concert in the Town Hall, the players being the London Symphony Orchestra, and the conductor the indefatigable Dr. Allen. This was the great event of the term, the principal items being Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll' (with the seventeen instruments), Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and Brahms's Symphony in C minor, Op. 68. We have never heard this Orchestra in better form, their responsiveness to the beat being perfect. The encoring of 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and the consequent delay, caused an exodus from the Hall after each movement of the Brahms Symphony.

On December 2 the Professor of Music (Sir Walter Parratt) gave a very interesting and instructive lecture on 'Rounds, Catches, and Canons,' in the Sheldonian Theatre, to a large audience. He began by saying that though there were not many musicians who could not write a hymn-tune, it took an expert to write either a round, catch, or canon. He strongly advocated their use in singing-classes especially, as they taught habits of independent part-singing. Various illustrations were given by Dr. Allen, Mr. Ley, and others, from Tallis's simple canon, 'Glory to Thee,' to Schumann's lovely Canon for organ in B minor.

On December 3 M. Egon Petri gave a pianoforte recital in the Town Hall, playing four Bach Preludes as arranged by Busoni, Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, Op. 110, and a Chopin selection.

The Sunday evening concerts during term have as usual been continued under the able direction of Dr. Walker.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The most important event of the month has been the hundredth concert of the Sheffield Amateur Musical Society, the senior choral body in the district and one which has had a large share in building up the vocal reputation of the city. The operations of the Society have been confined to Sheffield, save that in 1909 they sang at Queen's Hall, London, on the occasion of the Mendelssohn Centenary. Behind the Society is a record of consistent and enterprising progress. In the course of 100 concerts many important works have been either introduced to Sheffield audiences or revived. In the latter category stands Bach's Magnificat in D, of which this Society gave the first performance in England. The organization was established in 1864 by Mr. H. Walter Ibbotson, a composer and conductor of high local standing. He was followed by Mr. C. F. Schöllhammer, who directed the Society for thirty-five years. In 1904 Sir Henry Wood and Mr. J. A. Rodgers were appointed joint conductors, an arrangement which still exists.

Sir Henry conducted the memorable concert, the chief work being 'The Dream of Gerontius,' which he had not hitherto directed in this city. A strong cast of soloists was secured in Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Herbert Heyner. The orchestra was that of the Sheffield Promenade Concerts, supplemented by a few players from Queen's Hall. Mr. J. W. Phillips was organist. The choir, some 300 strong, sang the work with all the finish and polished diction which have become a tradition of the Society. The men of the choir gave a beautiful example of shaded, sympathetic singing in Brahms's Alto Rhapsody, Miss Muriel Foster singing the solo part with all her wide command of expressiveness.

A newly-formed amateur body, the Sheffield Symphony Orchestra, gave an inaugural concert at the Albert Hall on December 17. Lieutenant S. Suckley conducted a programme which included Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony. The Orchestra is excellently balanced, and in both rhythm and expression give promise of a good standard when general habits of precision have been acquired. Miss Wathen-Cole and Mr. William Burrows gave songs.

At the third Sheffield Subscription Concert, Mr. Michael Balling and the Hallé Orchestra appeared. In the programme was Strauss's 'Don Juan' Tone-poem of which a spirited performance was given; and Mr. Ernst von Lengyel played Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto with a sure grasp of its alternating brilliance and tenderness.

Mr. Leonard Hinchcliffe, a gifted local violinist, gave a successful recital, and Mr. Conri Tait revealed a fine technique and artistic judgment at his interesting pianoforte recital.

At the third of Miss Foxon's concerts, Miss Elena Gerhardt gave a thoroughly enjoyable Lieder recital.

WORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

Leeds has had almost more than its usual share of music during the last month. Mr. Julian Clifford has brought his series of Saturday Popular Concerts to an end. On November 22 he gave a Tchaikovsky programme, including such favourite compositions as the 'Casse Noisette' Suite and the Variations from the Suite in G, while less familiar than these was the Andante and Finale for pianoforte and orchestra, the solo part in which was finely played by Mr. Clifford himself. Mr. Robert Chignell was the vocalist. At the next concert, on November 29, M. de Ribapierre was the soloist in Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole,' which he played with nice feeling and brilliance of execution. Dr. Ethel Smyth's 'Wreckers' Overture was new to Leeds, and was well played under Mr. Clifford's direction, as were the 'Rouet d'Omphale' by Saint-Saëns and Elgar's second 'Wand of Youth' Suite. The vocalist was Miss Edith Evans, who sang Senta's ballad very expressively. The concluding concert on December 6 was not orchestral, and the miscellaneous programme, though suited to its purpose, was not of great general interest. Mr. Turton conducted the Leeds New Choral Society in some part-songs, the Hon. Mrs. Julian Clifford was among the vocalists, and Miss Levinskaja played pianoforte solos very brilliantly. On November 19 the Leeds New Choral Society gave a concert at which 'Acis and Galatea' received, under Mr. Turton's direction, a bright and effective interpretation. The rest of the programme was given to selections from 'Tannhäuser,' which were creditably performed, though they proved not quite so well within the Society's scope as Handel's music. The vocalists, Miss Lillian Dillingham, Mr. Richard Ripley, and Mr. Bridge Peters, were thoroughly efficient. The second of the Saturday Popular Concerts, organized last season in continuation of the Municipal Concerts, but without the embarrassment of municipal patronage, took place on December 13, when Mr. Fricker conducted a Wagner programme, designed as a somewhat belated commemoration of his centenary, and including representative extracts from 'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin,' 'The Mastersingers,' and 'The Ring,' together with the 'Faust' Overture. Miss Jennie Hook sang three solos from the operas very artistically.

Two of the Leeds Musical Evenings have taken place since last I wrote: on November 18, Mr. Theodore Byard gave a vocal recital, and on December 9 Messrs. Herbert Fryer and Felix Salmond gave some quite brilliant performances of music for pianoforte and violoncello, including a masterly and vital interpretation of Brahms's Sonata for violoncello and pianoforte. On December 2, Miss Gladys Peck introduced herself to the public as a budding vocalist of promise, and her interpretation of a long series of songs of all types showed versatility and intelligence. On December 10, the annual Advent service in Leeds Parish Church, at which the 'German Requiem' of Brahms was given, took place. It followed accustomed lines, but the conductor was new, Mr. W. H. Williams having recently succeeded Dr. Bairstow as organist. Mr. Ernest Bullock, now assistant-organist of Manchester Cathedral, was, as on some previous occasions, the organist, but had practically a new instrument to play upon, for though the organ now being reconstructed by Messrs. Harrison, of Durham, is not yet completed, quite enough of it was ready to serve the purpose, and, it may be added, proved of excellent quality. As at present arranged, the organ is to be formally opened on January 25. Pianoforte and kettledrums supplemented the organ. The bass solos were most ably sung by Mr. Hayle, and the soprano solo was sung by four choirsboys with a somewhat mechanical effect.

On December 12, an interesting recital of music for violin and organ was given in St. Chad's, Headingley,—where, by the way, there is another Harrison organ of recent construction. The violinist, Miss Sarah Fennings, is well known as an apostle of the Sevcik method, and her broad tone was heard to advantage, while she had in Mr. Percy Richardson a most artistic colleague. Handel's Sonata in A, and Reubke's magnificent Organ fugue in C minor, were among the most striking things in the programme. Two chamber concerts call for brief mention. On the 16th, Mr. Percy Richardson and Mr. Edward Maude began a series of Sonata recitals, playing works by Bach, Beethoven (in C minor, Op. 30) and Dvorák (in F, Op. 57), songs being contributed by Miss Pattie Hornsby; and on the following evening, at the Leeds Bohemian Concert, Pianoforte trios by Mozart (in G), Brahms (in E flat), and Dvorák (in B flat), were given by Messrs. Herbert Johnson (pianoforte), Alexander Cohen, and A. Hemingway.

OTHER TOWNS.

The Bradford Subscription Concert on November 21 was distinguished by the singing of Lieder by Miss Elena Gerhardt, of whom it is only necessary to say that she was in exceedingly good voice and delighted her hearers, and by the refined pianoforte-playing of Miss Irene Scharrer. M. Achille Rivarde was the violinist. At the next concert of the series, on December 12, the Hallé Orchestra, under Mr. Balling, was heard in Richard Strauss's 'Also sprach Zarathustra,' which had not before been heard in Yorkshire, and gave a fine performance, which was applauded to the echo by the large audience; but whether it was the work or its brilliant interpretation that caught their fancy it would be difficult to decide. Erich Korngold's 'Schauspiel' Overture was also a novelty to the county, and its freshness and fancy compelled one to acknowledge the precocious genius of this young composer. Miss Münthe-Kaas was the vocalist, and sang exceedingly well, but in nothing very new or interesting.

The Bradford Permanent Orchestra on December 6 was conducted by the well-known pianist, Mr. Frederick Dawson, who gave a thoughtful reading of Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet,' and introduced a young and promising pupil, Miss Guendolen Roe, who played Liszt's E flat Pianoforte concerto with great facility, if still lacking the force which it demands. Miss Doris Woodall was a vocalist of much more than ordinary interest. On December 5 a string quartet party, new to the public, the Edgar Drake Quartet, gave a concert, at which their proficiency and good ensemble were proved in Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat (Op. 44, No. 3) and Dvorák's Quartet in F (Op. 96). With Mr. George Smith as pianist two pleasing little pieces for Pianoforte trio by Glinka were introduced. Mr. Harry Horner was the vocalist. On December 3, Mrs. Herz gave a chamber concert at which, with Mr. Alexander Cohen as violinist, she played Violin and Pianoforte sonatas by Schubert and César Franck, and introduced out of her own compositions, a thoughtful and interesting Sonata in C minor (Op. 7) for the same instruments. Mrs. Allan-Black sang a number of songs by her brother, the well-known composer, Mr. Frederick Delius, of whose music but little has hitherto been heard in his native town.

At the Huddersfield Subscription Concert on November 18 M. Moriz Rosenthal's playing of Chopin was the most striking feature. At the next concert, on December 9, Mr. Julian Clifford conducted his recently-organized Yorkshire Orchestra in Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony and Violin concerto, Mr. John Dunn being the soloist. The Glee and Madrigal Society, under Mr. C. H. Moody, gave a concert mainly of unaccompanied music on December 2, and the Huddersfield Philharmonic Society gave an orchestral concert, conducted by Mr. J. E. Ibeson, on December 6. The Morley Choral Society, of which Mr. Fricker is the conductor, gave a very vigorous interpretation of Elgar's 'King Olaf' on December 2, with Miss Jennie Hook, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Colombo as principals. On the following evening the Cleckheaton Philharmonic Society produced the Third Act of 'The Flying Dutchman,' under Mr. Charles Stott's direction. Miss Felix, Mr. Popplewell, and Mr. Peters were the soloists. Mr. Hamilton Harty's 'The Mystic Trumpeter,' after its success at the Leeds Festival, has been promptly taken up by the Armley Society, who gave it with much success under Mr. H. H. Pickard on December 9, together with Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet.' The soloist was Mr. Harry Horner. On the same evening the Batley Choral Society essayed Handel's 'Samson,' with Miss Evans-Williams, Miss Boocock, Mr. Binks, and Mr. Hayle as soloists, and under Mr. Fearnley's conductorship. The Wakefield Chamber Concert on December 4 introduced Miss Chabot as pianist and Miss Marjorie Hayward as violinist, who played a Mozart Sonata and Mr. York Bowen's clever and effective Suite in D minor with much artistic refinement. Mr. Campbell McInnes sang many songs with his accustomed intelligence. On December 17, the Wakefield Choral Society, of which Mr. Percy Bligh is the conductor, gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and 'Hiawatha's Departure.'

Mr. C. H. Moody, the Ripon Cathedral organist, has always been very assiduous in introducing fitting masterpieces at special services in the Cathedral, and on December 3 he conducted Brahms's 'German Requiem,' with the assistance of Mr. Pattman as organist, and some of the members of his Huddersfield Society to strengthen the choir. On December 11, the enterprising Middlesbrough Musical Union gave one of their unhackneyed programmes, that included Max Bruch's Cantata 'Fair Ellen,' and Dr. Harford Lloyd's 'Hero and Leander,' of which, under Mr. Kilburn's direction, excellent performances were given. Miss Manton and Mr. Ivor Foster were the soloists. The Leeds Symphony Orchestra were also heard in Elgar's 'Variations,' and other pieces.

The Hull Vocal Society, on November 18, gave, under Mr. G. H. Smith, a concert of unaccompanied choral music, of which Palestrina's 'Stabat Mater' was the most important number. Miss Violet Roberts and Mr. Charles Tree contributed songs.

On December 1, at the Hull Subscription Concert, the marvellous performance of the boy violinist, Sigmund Feuermann, in, among other things, Ernst's F sharp minor Concerto, was the outstanding feature. Mr. Schelling's fine pianoforte-playing and Miss Ruth Vincent's brilliant singing also deserve mention. On December 5, at the Hull Philharmonic Concert, Mr. J. W. Hudson conducted a most creditable performance of the 'Pathetic' Symphony, and Dukas's Scherzo, 'L'Apprenti Sorcier.' Miss Florence Macbeth was the singer.

Mr. Percy V. Sharman is giving a series of chamber concerts at York, and on November 17 he introduced the late W. Y. Hurlestone's powerful and interesting Pianoforte quartet in E minor, a work which, while showing the undoubted influence of Brahms, gave promise for a future which, unhappily, was not to be fulfilled. In this, and Schumann's Pianoforte quintet, Mr. Sharman was assisted by Miss Leila Willoughby, Miss Knocker, Mr. John Groves, and Mr. Padel (pianoforte). Miss Braselmann was the vocalist. At the York Symphony Orchestra's concert on November 26, Schumann's Pianoforte concerto, with Mr. Padel as soloist, was given, together with other pieces. Dr. Bairstow and Miss Knocker shared the duties of conductor, and Miss Caroline Hatchard was the vocalist. On December 16, the York Musical Society, which is also under Dr. Bairstow's direction, gave Parry's 'Pied Piper,' and both choir and orchestra are said to have given evidence of his careful training.

At Scarborough two of Mr. Hylton Stewart's Chamber Concerts have to be recorded. On November 19 the Leeds Trio (Messrs. Cohen, Hemingway, and Johnson) gave a fine and stirring performance of Rachmaninoff's 'Elegiac' Pianoforte trio in D minor, Brahms's Violin sonata in A, and Beethoven's great Trio in B flat (Op. 97). On December 3, Mr. Edgar Drake's Quartet appeared in String quartets by Beethoven and Dvorák. At the Scarborough Philharmonic Society's concert on December 4, Dr. Ely conducted a most interesting and ambitious programme, including Elgar's 'The Music Makers,' Cowen's 'He giveth His beloved sleep,' and 'Tod und Verklärung,' this being the first appearance of a Strauss orchestral work in the town. Miss Hilda Cragg-James was the soloist.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

BATH.—Mr. Frank Tapp's Symphony, based upon Shakespeare's 'The Tempest,' achieved a great success at its recent production under the composer's baton, when two performances were given by the Pump Room Orchestra in one day. Its four movements take seventy minutes in performance, but such are the fertility of idea and the quality of the workmanship, that its appeal was fully sustained.

BEDFORD.—An excellent concert was given by the Musical Society on December 2, the features being the choice of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Kubla Khan' as the principal work and the presence of Miss Phyllis Lett as soloist. A beautiful and impressive performance was given under Dr. Harding's direction. The remainder of the programme was miscellaneous, and included unaccompanied part-songs.

BERKHAMSTED.—An interesting programme was chosen by the Church Choral Society for their twenty-fourth concert, on December 9. Dvorák's 'Patriotic Hymn' and Parry's 'Pied Piper of Hamelin' were creditably sung under the direction of Mr. W. H. London, and the choir also appeared to advantage in smaller choral works. The soloists of the evening were Mr. Harold Wilde and Mr. Stewart Gardner. The audience were greatly appreciative throughout.

CALGARY (CANADA).—A Symphony Orchestra that has just been formed in this city gave its first concert in Sherman's Grand Theatre on November 10. The works performed, under the conductorship of Herr Max Weil, were Haydn's 'Military' Symphony, Weber's 'Der Freischütz' Overture, Massenet's Suite 'Scènes Alsaciennes' and Meditation from 'Thais' (solo violin, M. Rowland Leach), and two Slavonic Dances by Dvorák. A week before the concert a lecture on 'Symphonic Form' was delivered in the hall of the Public Library by Mrs. Annie Glen Broder.

CANTERBURY.—An excellent concert was given at the St. Margaret's Hall on December 11 by the St. Lawrence and East Kent Orchestral Society, under the able direction of Mr. Percy Godfrey. The programme included incidental music to 'Twelfth night' by Mr. W. T. Harvey, who conducted the performance, and three movements of a Suite for wind instruments and pianoforte, by Mr. Godfrey. The soloists were Mr. Sidney Coltham (vocalist), and Miss Thora Fielding (violinist).

CHELMSFORD.—Mr. F. R. Frye's Choral Society gave the first concert of their fourth season on Tuesday, December 9, at the Shire Hall, before a large audience. The choir gave an excellent interpretation of Stanford's choral ballad, 'Phaudrig Crohoore,' and also a dainty performance of Dr. Walford Davies's 'Nursery Rhymes.' The soloists were Miss Florence Fleming, Mr. Ernest Stepan, and Mr. John Prout (vocalists), and Miss Nora Freeley (violinist). Miss Ethel Waumsley was the accompanist, and Mr. Frye conducted.

CHICHESTER.—The Musical Society upheld their reputation on December 10 with an excellent performance of Parry's 'Judith,' under the direction of Dr. Read. The choral singing was on a high plane of efficiency and expressiveness, and good solo interpretations were given by Miss Gladys Moger, Miss Dora Arnell, Mr. Henry Turnpenney, and Mr. Montague Borwell. An orchestra of thirty accompanied.

GRIMSBY.—On November 18, the Grimsby Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Percy Wilson, performed Beethoven's fifth Symphony, the Overtures to 'Ruy Blas' and 'Tannhäuser,' Saint-Saëns's Prelude to the 'The Deluge,' an Entr'acte by Borodine, and a Legende, 'Hero and Leander,' by R. C. Thorpe, a member of the Society. The lighter pieces were tastefully played, and the concert as a whole did credit to the Society. The vocalist was Miss Margaret Balfour. Miss Marie Hall and Herr Alexander Raab gave a violin and pianoforte recital on December 2, with Mr. Sam Hempstall as vocalist, and Miss Dorothy Treseder as accompanist.

LINCOLN.—An interesting concert—financially the most successful in the history of the Musical Society—was given on November 26. The programme was devoted to Wagner as a centenary celebration, and under Dr. Bennett's direction striking and admirable performances were given of the first Act and Bridal Procession from 'Lohengrin,' and the Grail Scene from 'Parsifal.' The choir played their part with noteworthy ability and expressive force. The solo work was given by Miss Eleanor Felix, Miss May Brummett, Mr. David Brazell, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Frederic Austin; Miss Felix and the two last-named added well-known excerpts from the operas, and choir and orchestra brought the concert to an end with the March Chorus from 'Tannhäuser.'

NEWPORT (ISLE OF WIGHT).—On December 10 a successful concert was given by the Newport Choral Society in the presence of a distinguished company. Stanford's 'The Revenge,' and Wagner's 'Hail, bright abode,' from

'Tannhäuser,' were splendidly sung by the choir, under the able direction of Mr. J. H. Jackson. In the miscellaneous portion of the programme, Mr. George Brierley and Mr. Joseph Farrington scored a distinct success in the duet from Act I, Scene I, of 'Faust.'

NORTHAMPTON.—The performance of Parry's 'Judith,' given by the Musical Society on December 11, was one of high merit in all directions, and great credit is due to the conductor, Mr. C. J. King, for the results obtained. The solo parts were taken by Madame Gleeson-White, Miss Norah Dawnay, Mr. Henry Brearley, and Mr. Charles Wade.

NORWICH.—The Philharmonic Society, which is one of the oldest orchestral Societies in the country, opened their present season on December 11 with a successful concert in St. Andrew's Hall, under the conductorship of Dr. Frank Bates. The Society has the co-operation of the Norwich Choral Society, which is also conducted by Dr. Bates, and the combined bodies on this occasion gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' and the second Act of Wagner's 'The Flying Dutchman.' The soloists were Miss Ada Forrest, Madame Amy Dewhurst, Mr. Harold Wilde, Mr. David Brazell, and Mr. Herbert Heyner. 'A tale of Old Japan' made a deep impression on a crowded audience. The second concert of this season will take place on February 19 with Brahms's Symphony No. 2, which will be the principal item of the programme.

PORTSMOUTH.—The music of Coleridge-Taylor was exemplified at its best by the concert of the Philharmonic Society, on December 4, for both 'A tale of Old Japan' and the 'Bon-bon Suite' were in the programme. The choir made excellent use of their opportunities for expression and vocal effect. The soloists were Miss Mary Leighton, Miss Grace Heywood, Mr. Joseph Reed, Mr. Stewart Gardner, and Mr. Walford E. Lovatt. Mr. Hugh Barry conducted.

PURLEY.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' again proved its popularity when performed by the Choral Union on December 8. It was sung with commendable spirit and expressiveness, and both the work and the performance earned the favour of the audience. An equal success attended the performance of MacCunn's 'The wreck of the Hesperus.' Mr. Harold Macpherson conducted, and good solo-singing was contributed by Miss Maidstone Campbell, Miss Hayward Webb, Mr. Ivor Warren, and Mr. Proctor Brown.

SEVENOAKS.—The twenty-eighth concert of the Sevenoaks Choral and Orchestral Society was given in the Club Hall on December 10, when Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was performed before a large and appreciative audience. The soloists were Madame Ada Le Marchant, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Hubert Curling. The local Orchestra (augmented for the occasion) were led by Miss Phyllis Knight. A notable feature of the performance was the fine singing of the choir, which reflected great credit upon the excellent and painstaking training given by the hon. conductor, Mr. W. A. Taylor, the founder of the Society.

SIDCUP.—Sir Edward Elgar's Cantata, 'The Black Knight' was performed on December 2 at the King's Hall by the Sidcup Choral and Orchestral Society. The choir sang throughout with freshness, precision, and true grip of the composer's requirements. The orchestra of forty-five, reinforced by London players, was well-balanced, and added to the programme a weighty reading of Beethoven's C minor Symphony. Sir Charles Stanford's 'Phaëdrig Crohoore' concluded the evening, and was an unqualified success. Mr. C. W. Wilson conducted with skill and discretion.

SOUTHPORT.—On December 5, at the Cambridge Hall, the Southport Choral Society gave a fine performance of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah,' under the conductorship of Mr. J. C. Clarke. The choruses were sung with great fervour and dramatic power, and on this occasion the choir undoubtedly surpassed their many previous excellent performances of the same work. The solo artists were Madame Annie Walker, Miss Hilda Cragg-James, Mr. Arthur Wilkes, and Mr. Herbert Parker. The accompaniments were well played by the orchestra, which included members of the Hallé and Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestras.

WORCESTER.—A programme of unusual interest was chosen for the concert given by the Festival Choral Society on November 25, under the direction of Mr. Ivor Atkins. It included Brahms's eight-part unaccompanied 'Fest und Gedenksprüche,' and the second Act of Gluck's 'Orpheus.' The performances were characterized by great merit on the part of choir, orchestra, and soloists (Miss Mary Sykes and Miss Margaret Balfour).—The Musical Society gave the first concert of their twenty-second season on December 9. Sterndale Bennett's 'The Woman of Samaria' and Dr. Vaughan-Williams's 'Fantasia on Christmas carols' were well performed. The principals were Madame Aston, Miss Evelyn Osborn, Mr. Ernest Howell, and Mr. Graham Smart. Mr. W. Mann Dyson conducted. The orchestra and choir were well balanced, and did their work efficiently. It was a most enjoyable concert.

Answers to Correspondents.

B.H.R.—If your song commends itself, as a saleable commodity, to a publisher's musical adviser, the firm will buy the copyright from you and the publication will cost you nothing. To retain the copyright and give an order for printing and publication is expensive.

C. T.—'Windy' should be pronounced to rhyme with 'shindy'. We prefer to hear 'wind' sung (even in poetry) to rhyme with 'sinned' and not with 'find.'

The

Competition Festival Record

No. 66.

Memorial to Miss Mary Egerton.

A committee is being formed under influential auspices to raise a fund to establish a memorial to the late Miss Mary Egerton, of York, who devoted so much of her life to the spread of music, and especially to the establishment of competition festivals in various parts of the country. Miss Egerton was joint-secretary of the Association of Competitive Festivals.

A Salutory Rule.

One of the difficulties of promoters of Welsh Eisteddfodau, who desire to conduct choral competitions on fair and equitable lines, is the looseness of the membership of competitive choirs. Only too often competent singers are induced to forsake, temporarily or permanently, their allegiance to the conductor under whom they have gained their skill and to desert the comrades with whom they have worked and striven, simply because another conductor offers payment. We are very glad to note that the managers of the Mountain Ash Cottage Hospital Eisteddfod, which is to be held on Easter Monday, have, in consultation with the managers of other Eisteddfodau, resolved to stop this practice so far as they are able to do so. They have adopted and issued the following drastic rule:

CHORAL CONDITIONS.

All choirs taking part in the Mixed Choral or Male-Voice Competitions must consist of bona-fide residents of the town or district represented by the name of the choir or society.

Any chorister removed to another town or district in which no choir intends entering for the one and same competition may continue his membership of a choir with which he or she may have been regularly connected for two years immediately preceding, provided his or her services are voluntary and no payment whatsoever is received by him or her therefor.

The East Anglian Competition, which appeals to the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, the Isle of Ely, and Huntingdonshire, will be held at Cambridge on April 25. A novelty in the Syllabus has been introduced by Dr. E. W. Naylor, who is taking interest in the whole scheme:

QUARTET OF BRASS INSTRUMENTS.

Qualification (open to all residents in East Anglia).

Test: 'When evening's twilight' (Hatton).

Publisher: Novello. Part-songs 18s. 2d.

To be arranged for the particular combination entering, e.g., in F, if the quartet is composed of two B flat cornets, a trombone, and a euphonium; in low B flat, if the quartet is two E flat horns, one baritone, and an E flat bombardon; or in high A flat, for one E flat cornet, one B flat cornet, one E flat horn, and baritone, &c.

This competition is intended to encourage playing in tune, and it is hoped different quartets from the same band will enter.

MUSICAL v. VERBAL PHRASING.

Mr. E. N. Hay, Mus. Bac. Oxon., of Coleraine, Ireland, writes to us as follows:

To the Editor of THE COMPETITION FESTIVAL RECORD.

DEAR SIR,—In the September number of the COMPETITION FESTIVAL RECORD, 'M.' brings forward once again the question of the comma and its treatment in choral music—this time so didactically that some comment seems to be called for.

The facts that I have had some little experience in choral work, competitive and otherwise, and that I have been penalised at such competitions for the very reason that I did not kowtow in this matter to the 'vagaries of adjudicators' justify me, I hope, in putting forward my views.

I ask, if punctuation is to be sacrificed to the musical phrase, how is the import of the words to be conveyed to the listener? When composers—e.g., Bantock, Bairstow, Walford Davies, and a few others—are careful enough to ally the musical to the verbal phrase, all, of course, goes well. But what of the broad, flowing Elgarian phrase that often takes little account, seemingly, of the librettist? E.g., anyone of average intelligence will read Andrew Lang's 'My love dwelt' as a piece of prose; he will not pause at the end of each line unless such pause be demanded by the sense; he will regulate his breathing, not by physical necessity, but by the laws of rhetoric. Then, if he takes up Elgar's setting of the poem, where in several places neither the melodic phrase nor the harmonic scheme seems (from the purely abstract—shall I say, instrumental—point of view) to accord with the verbal phrase, what is he to do? Shall he regard the poem as a mere jargon of nicely-sounding words, the fount of inspiration as a mere peg on which to hang a melody that may or may not fit? 'Go, song of mine' is another instance. Yet who would contend that Elgar wrote ignorantly or carelessly? Nay, can we not see in it all a new, a deeper meaning in his phrases, not at once obvious it may be, but withal tacitly demanding for its true significance a due observance of punctuation? Again, on an infinitely lower level, take Dykes's 'Lux Benigna.' The instances here of the clashing of musical and verbal phrases are so well known, and the result of the predominance of music over words so notoriously ludicrous, as to make detailed reference superfluous. To instance one more case, how many misguided souls have denied themselves that 'road' which they would assure us they are seeking, one and all, to lead them 'daily nearer God'?

In the January RECORD supplement, there appeared an article referring to Elena Gerhardt's sublime phrasing in a German song as an instance of eminent indifference to punctuation. But the writer, methinks, rather defeated his object, since the breath-marks he gave in the verse quoted coincided in every case with the sense of the words!

In fine, Mr. Brendan Rogers's dictum at a recent Festival, 'Phrasing is punctuation in music,' sums up my argument. But be it understood that I refer only to intelligent punctuation on the part of the librettist—not to cases where the stops are carelessly omitted, nor yet to those where they are unnecessarily frequent. The choir-master must be his own proof-reader, and as such he must be, firstly, master of elocution, and after that, musician.

E. N. HAY.

The only allusions to the musical treatment of the comma that appeared in the September RECORD were as follows:

'The musical phrase was sacrificed to verbal expression, the comma was an obstacle.'

'The comma was a stumbling-block. There was not a single complete phrase, the rhythmic flow was disturbed, and there were many gaps' (page 74).

These remarks were made in a criticism of the Royal National Eisteddfod held at Abergavenny, and they were not by 'M,' but by one of the ablest and most experienced adjudicators in the country.

Mr. Hay reads too much into the objection made to comma-worship. It does not necessarily mean that all punctuation, including the full stop, must be entirely ignored in the interest of the musical phrase. The underlying and really important contention is simply that the full sense of the words can in most cases be conveyed without pulling up at every grammatical punctuation sign, and without destroying the musical phrase. No more exact general principle can be laid down. Every difficult case must be decided on its merits, and here the best judges will differ. We are not clear as to what Mr. Hay would consider the right treatment of the two Elgar settings he adduces. They are typical cases of difficulty. He says that the deeper meaning of Elgar's phrases demands for its true significance a due observance of punctuation. But what is a 'due observance'? What of the commas in the fifth line of 'Go, song of mine'? We print the line in the way it is set by the composer:

'Yet, say, yet, say, the unerring spirit
Of grief shall guide his soul.'

The music is continuous. If 'due observance of punctuation' means an interruption of the sostenuto musical phrase at each comma, we protest, and comma or no comma, both music and words should be phrased before 'shall.' We submit that the commas in this case (except as to the fourth) should not be an auricular effect.

Three great Lieder singers, Elena Gerhardt, Julia Culp, and Muriel Foster, have recently given recitals in London. A close study of their phrasing shows that it is not governed by punctuation, but by the musical factor and the general sense of the words which, in every song performed, was made absolutely clear to the auditor.

In Brahms's 'Blinde Kuh,' Muriel Foster sang:

'Im Finstern geh' ich suchen;
Mein Kind, wo steckst du wohl?'

each time it occurred without pause and to one breath, and in 'Willst du, dass ich geh?'

'Wie ist's hier in deinem Arm
Traut und warm, traut und warm;'

the last two lines were similarly continuously treated.

Here is some of the phrasing of the other artists:

MISS ELENA GERHARDT.

'DIE FORELLE' (Schubert).

In einem Bächlein helle
Da schoss in froher Eil' *
Die launische Forelle Vorüber wie ein Pfeil.*

Ich stand an dem Gestade
Und sah' in süßser Ruh' *
Des muntern Fischlein's Bade
Im klaren Bächlein zu.*

Ein Fischer mit der Rute Wohl an dem Ufer stand *
Und sah's mit kaltem Blute

So lang dem Wasser Helle,*
So dacht' ich, nicht gebracht,*
So fangt er die Forelle
Mit seiner Angel nicht.*

Doch endlich ward dem Diebe *
Die Zeit zu lang.* Er macht
Das Bächlein tückisch trübe,*
Und eh' ich es gedacht,*

So zuckte seine Rute,
Das Fischlein zappelt dran *
Und ich mit regem Blute *
Sah die Betrog'ne an.

MISS JULIA CULP.

'RECHT WIE EIN LEICHNAM WANDLE ICH UMHER' (Erich Wolff).

Recht wie ein Leichnam wandle ich umher,*
Nachts zu seiner Tür* und seufze schwer
Aus meiner Brust,
An Trost und Wohlsein leer.*
Wie von dem Ast im Traum
Ein Vogel fällt,*
So flatt' r ich nachts, so ungesellt;*
Ein Unglücksvogel nimmermehr gefällt!
O meine Tränen,*
Ihr seid den Himmels Gaben darin* so gleich;
An allem bin ich arm,* an euch bin ich so reich.*
O Tränen,* O meine Tränen!*

MORECAMBE FESTIVAL.

ADJUDICATORS' IMPRESSIONS, 1913.

The detailed report (1913) of the leading events is issued, and can be obtained from the Secretary, Musical Festival Office, post free, 7d. The following are extracts from some of the general remarks made by adjudicators:

Dr. H. Walford Davies:

I regret that I only heard the Friday evening's concert and the Saturday's work. But I was greatly impressed once more by the vast possibilities it still holds for development, and that (as far as I know) on pioneer lines. Everywhere one hears of the waning of the old Musical Festivals (non-competitive, with star artists); and everywhere there are springing up the new Competitive Musical Festivals, of which Morecambe is a noted pioneer. When such superb choirs as those of the Challenge Shield Classes are met, and when a vast and sympathetic audience is ready to drink in their every note; furthermore, when many of them have come many miles and must return, not only losers, but without having sung two of their prepared pieces, it seems an obvious step to crown the uses and pleasures of the Saturday Festival by the institution of some combined singing, which would, I imagine, be a joy to all concerned and prove a very popular part of the Morecambe Institution.

Mr. Harry Evans:

The tribute to the memory of the late Canon Gorton by the combined local choirs was appropriate and touching. The Morecambe Festival has had a long and honourable career, but there is still work for it to do, and there are not wanting signs that the future will bring developments worthy of Morecambe's highest traditions.

Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson.

In the test-piece from the 'St. Matthew' Passion, a very high standard was attained, and I was glad to notice an almost entire absence among the competitors of that self-consciousness which has been so painful a feature in this class in some other years. Also the prevalence of 'oo' tone was not nearly so marked as it has been, and many of the boys sang with a beautiful and at the same time natural production, which might fairly be said to set a standard of what is required in such a class.

Dr. J. W. G. Hathaway:

I would recommend all critics of judges to sit in a box of their own if it is impossible to occupy the official one, and weigh and balance according to the scheme of marks published the pros and cons of each choir or soloist as they appear on the platform. Remember, general impressions are dangerous. Prejudices must be banished, and the matter approached with an open mind, an artistic and technical knowledge, and system. The whole thing will then appear in a new light. Let him add to this, if he choose, the responsibility of giving the prizes to the best competitors, and the words the losers will give vent to in any case! This is not a defence of the judges. They are quite capable of taking care of themselves. It is merely an impression of judging. An opinion arrived at after spending years severely criticising adjudicators and then occupying a seat in the judicial box.

Mr. C. H. Fogg.

I must speak with the greatest satisfaction of the splendid sportive character with which all adjudications were received. I heard no dissentient note whatever, and congratulate you all on bringing the Festival through so successfully.

SYLLABUS FOR 1914.

May 5, 6, 7, 8, 9.

The Syllabus for this event is now issued, and can be obtained from Mr. W. C. Fawcett, Morecambe, price 4d., post free. The scheme, as usual, is a very comprehensive one, and will no doubt be found very attractive to the large clientele to which it appeals. On the first evening there will be a Church Festival service and a Free Church Festival. Forty-seven classes are enumerated in the competition, which will be spread over four days. The tests in the three chief open choral classes will be as follows:

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

- 'The Happy Isle' (Bantock).
- 'In the heart of a blooming rose' (Hathaway).

MALE-VOICE CHOIR.

- 'The Reveille' (Elgar).
- 'New-Year's Song' (Weingartner).
- 'The Home-coming' (Van Holst).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (A).

- Madrigal, 'Stay, heart, run not so fast' (Morley).
- Six-part song, 'Spring wind' (Hubert Bath).
- Madrigal, 'What is our life?' (Gibbons).
- Part-song, 'These sweeter far than lilies are' (Walford Davies).

A new Cantata for children, 'Childe Allan-a-dale,' by Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, will be a feature of the children's day. Stanford's 'Last post' will be performed at another concert. The greatest effort will be the presentation of Bach's Mass in B minor, which will be given by four of the finest choirs of the district (Barrow, Lancaster, Carnforth, and Morecambe), with full orchestral accompaniment, under Mr. Harry Evans. The soloists will be Mr. Gervase Elwes, Miss Silvers, and Mr. George Parker.

In some quarters there is a curious delusion that the choirs who succeed in competition do nothing else all the year round than practise competition tests.

The numerous friends, old and new, of this leading Festival will, we trust, give a whole-hearted support to this well-devised scheme.

MIDLAND (BIRMINGHAM) FESTIVAL.—May 18 to 23, 1914.

The Syllabus (4d., post free) of this Festival is now ready. It names 102 tests for the 78 classes. There are new classes for organ, violoncello, pianoforte duet, operatic and dramatic singing, Welsh Church and Chapel choirs, writing by ear and composition. Bach's double Motet, 'Sing ye to the Lord,' will be sung by combined choirs at the evening concert. The hon. secretaries are Messrs. George J. Bowker and F. W. Stevens (Queen's College, Birmingham).

RHODESIA.—June 1.

The second annual Rhodesian Eisteddfod will be held at Salisbury on Whit-Monday, June 1. The choral syllabus is as follows:

Mixed-Voice Choirs.—'And the glory of the Lord' (Handel); 'My love dwelt in a Northern land' (Elgar).

Male-Voice Choirs.—'Martyrs of the arena' (De Rillé).

Children's Choirs.—'The rainbow' and 'Songs of the forest' (Kinross).

There are also classes for vocal quartets and trios, adult and junior vocal solos, and instrumental solos. Composers are invited to submit ideas for a Rhodesian Anthem and a Regimental March for the Southern Rhodesia Volunteers, and a prize is offered for the best poem in the form of an 'Ode to Rhodesia.'

YORK.—November 29.

The County Choral Competitions, with which those for the Egerton Challenge Shield are now incorporated, took place at York on the above date. They were very successful in gathering many first-rate organizations, although Leeds and Bradford were not represented. Six mixed-voice choirs entered for the chief event. The tests were Edward German's charming part-song 'Sleeping,' and Coleridge-Taylor's dramatic setting 'The lee shore.' Mr. Harry Evans, who adjudicated, said he had never before heard 'Sleeping' sung so beautifully as it had been that day. The winners were the Middlesbrough Co-Operative Choir, who not only gave the fine performance referred to above, but also thrilled the audience by their dramatic intensity in 'The lee shore.' Mr. Atkinson, with his Tadcaster Choir, did almost as well, but the voices of these villagers had not the sonority of the Middlesbrough Choir. The chief results in other classes were as follows:

QUARTET (Open).

Test: 'Phyllis the fair' (Bainton).

- 1st. Miss Middleton's Quartet.

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open).

Test: 'The approach of May' (Walmisley).

- 1st. Pontefract Ladies' Choir (Mr. R. B. Walker).
- 2nd. York Co-Operative Choir (Mr. A. Hopkins).
- 3rd. Middlesbrough Madrigal Society (Mr. A. G. Hood).
- 4th. York Ladies' Glee Club (Mr. H. S. Wilkinson).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'Wilt thou be my dearie?' (Bantock).

- 'Encouragement to a lover' (Lee Williams).
- 'The Reveille' (Elgar).
- 'Strike the lyre' (Cooke).

- 1st. York Male-Voice Choir (Mr. H. S. Wilkinson).
- 2nd. Cleveland Harmonic.
- 3rd. Middlesbrough Apollo.

The hon. secretary of the Festival is Mr. E. C. Brooksbank.

CONGLETON.—December 6.

The Festival annually held by the Congleton Male-Voice Choir attracted an increased entry on this occasion, and three adjudicators—Dr. T. Keighley, Mr. J. Frederic Staton, and Mr. Charles Jessop—officiated. The chief event, a competition for male-voice choirs, brought ten entries, of whom the three best were, in order, Butt Lane Co-operative Choir (Mr. F. J. Bossons), Moorland Glee Party, Biddulph (Mr. H. Bailey), Longsight Glee Club (Mr. G. Grimes). The other choral class was that for children, in which the entering choirs, in the order of merit, were Goldenhill P.M. Juvenile Choir (Mr. F. J. Bossons), Woodcock Wells School (Mr. F. Willmer), and May Bank Sunday School (Mr. B. Dutton). There were also solo-singing classes, in which the first prizes were awarded to Miss Gwendie Ellis (soprano), Miss S. Smith (contralto), Mr. Walter H. Taylor (tenor), Mr. H. Meanock (bass), and Master Walter Willerton. The entries in these five classes totalled over a hundred.

Free Churches within the area of the Kingston and District Free Church Council were invited to send entries for a choral competition to take place at Kingston Baptist Church on December 10. Five choirs competed for the challenge shield in the section for mixed-voice bodies, in which the tests were Pinsuti's 'In this hour of softened splendour,' and Gounod's 'The King is Love'; and four ladies' choirs sang Smart's 'Rest thee on this mossy pillow.' In both classes the contingent from Eden Street Congregational (Mr. G. Eaton Hart) won the first place. Singers from the same Church were also successful in a quartet class. The adjudicator was Mr. Basil H. Philpott, organist of H.M. Chapel Royal at Hampton Court Palace.

A meeting of the executive committee of the National Eisteddfod of Wales was held on November 14, at Bangor (where the 1914 Eisteddfod will take place). It was resolved to perform 'The Dream of Gerontius' (Elgar) and 'Llewelyn' (Cyril Jenkins). Prof. Granville Bantock, Lieut. Miller, Mr. Harry Evans, and Mr. H. Harding, were elected adjudicators for the chief choral competitions.

An Eisteddfod was held at Young, Sydney, on November 13. Young Methodist Church sent the winners among five Church choirs. Young Philharmonic were first in the chief choral competition. There were also competitions for vocal and instrumental solos.

Mr. P. J. McKenna writes to point out that in the Mixed-Voice Class at the 'Chair' Eisteddfod, reported on p. 156 of our last issue, Willesden District Choir came second with ninety marks, Finchley Presbyterian being third, not second as announced.

CANTATAS.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION.
ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SECOND THOUSAND.

1. THE HOLY CITY

A SACRED CANTATA FOR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTEENTH THOUSAND.

2. THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."—The Musical Times.

Produced by the Birmingham Festival Choral Society.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. FORTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

3. JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL CANTATA FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

"Few Cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc.'"—The Western News.

"The music throughout is of a very high order. The various movements are widely contrasted in style, in some considerable dramatic power being manifest, but all overflow with melody."—Crystal Palace Reporter.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. TWENTY-FOURTH THOUSAND.

4. PASSION SERVICE

(Only published in Vocal Score)

FOR THE SEASON OF LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Mr. Gaul's work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed."—Sheffield Independent.

Arranged for a limited Orchestra—namely, Strings, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Cornets, Bass Trombone or Euphonium, and Kettledrums.

Price of Nos. 1 to 7, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal Parts, each, 1s.; Words only of Nos. 1, 2, 5, 6, 5s. per 100; ditto of Nos. 3, 4, 7, 7s. 6d. per 100.

The gratuitous loan of Orchestral Parts may be had upon application to the Composer's Executors (Gillott Lodge, Edgbaston), and full liberty is given to perform these Cantatas and to insert the words in any programme without further permission, subject to the condition that newly-purchased—not hired or second-hand—copies are used for their performance.

SCHOOL MUSIC.

THE ELFIN HILL

AN OPERETTA FOR UNISON SINGING.

"Mr. Gaul has been particularly happy in infusing the Norse spirit into that portion of his music which deals with goblin life in Norway. When the goblins become visitors in fairyland, the character of the music changes; lightness is its predominant feature, perhaps the choicest fragment being a fairy dance. This latter, together with a very characteristic dance of elves and a shadow dance, were beautifully executed."—Birmingham Gazette.

REDUCED PRICE, ONE SHILLING.

WORDS, SEVEN SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE PER HUNDRED.

Also THE LEGEND OF THE WOOD (Operetta), THE MONTHS (Vocal Duets), THE BIRDS (Vocal Trios), SIX SONGS

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTH THOUSAND.

5. THE PRINCE OF PEACE

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

"Here he shows a master hand in treatment and beauty of melody. The choruses . . . are among the finest examples of his prolific pen."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

" . . . a never-ending charm. This cantata, which completes the octave of Mr. Gaul's cantatas, we hold to be the best."

Birmingham Daily Gazette.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTH THOUSAND.

6. ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

"The Cantata contains all the elements of popularity, and it was excellently performed under the Composer's direction (by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace Orchestra) and very warmly received."—Standard.

"Likely to become quite as great a favourite with Choral Societies as 'The Holy City.'"—Daily Chronicle.

PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1893.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. NINTH THOUSAND.

7. UNA

CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

"Without doubt the concert of Wednesday evening was the most popular feature of the whole Festival. . . . The interest of the Norwich people was aroused to the fullest by the production of Mr. Gaul's 'Una.' . . . The performance was a self-evident success. . . . The Angelus Chorus made a lasting impression."—Norfolk Chronicle.

"Choral societies have long shown that Mr. Gaul is a composer whom they are glad to accept. 'Una' will find its way amongst them easily."—Daily Telegraph.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. SEVENTIETH THOUSAND.

Revised Edition, including an INTERMEZZO or SLOW DANCE to follow the Wedding Chorus.

Performed in the Town Hall, Birmingham, on twenty occasions.

8. RUTH

TOILERS OF THE DEEP

CANTATA FOR FEMALE VOICES.

"The musical settings are twelve in number, the part-writing for first and second sopranos and contraltos. The utmost care and finish has been bestowed in wedding appropriate music to the verse, and Mr. Gaul has written nothing finer, nor more melodious and captivating in this branch of composition specially adapted for High Schools for Girls. . . . Taking the cantata as a whole, it is a delightful work, replete with artistic workmanship, and, above all, melodious and expressive."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

FALSTAFF

SYMPHONIC-STUDY

IN C MINOR, WITH TWO INTERLUDES IN A MINOR FOR FULL ORCHESTRA.BY EDWARD ELGAR

OP. 68.

MINIATURE SCORE,
PAPER, 7s. 6d.; CLOTH, 10s. 6d.

FULL SCORE AND ORCHESTRAL PARTS ON HIRE.

THE TIMES.

We get again the Elgar of the brilliant "Cockaigne" Overture, of the "Pomp and Circumstance" and "Coronation" Marches. There is an abundance of highly original orchestration, and the whole is moulded with a stronger hand than are these earlier and smaller works.

THE TELEGRAPH.

It is certainly the most elaborate of Elgar's works so far. . . . It is on every page the hand and the voice of Elgar, who speaks with no uncertainty: in a vein of quaint humour, as when Falstaff sleeps; of rare beauty and charm, as in the interludes; and even more in the exquisite closing scene of the fall and death of Falstaff. . . . Elgar has given us a masterpiece of music, prodigiously stamped with his own remarkable personality.

THE MORNING POST.

Sir Edward Elgar's music is a remarkable example of his powers presented in a light hitherto unknown. He frankly enters the field of programme music and does so with immediate success. . . . As a musical illustration of a Shakespeare character it is one of the most remarkable scores produced. . . . Apart from its fidelity to the particular aspect of Falstaff offered by the play it has great value as music, and that value is found in the fact that the composer reveals an expansion of style and a great quality of beauty and charm. . . . The work, very finely played under the composer's guidance, marks an advance in Sir Edward Elgar's art, and constitutes a valuable addition to Shakespeare music whose worth cannot fail to be recognised.

THE DAILY GRAPHIC.

The design of his Symphonic Study is masterly in its breadth and decision, and no elaboration of detail is permitted to obscure the main outline of the structure. It falls into four main divisions, broken by two interludes, which, while still forming a material part of the development, come as a welcome relief to what might otherwise prove too breathless, a rush of incident. . . . The opening section is a lax miracle of life and gaiety. We are in the midst of a wit combat of bewildering dexterity. The themes fly backward and forward like tennis balls across a net. So rapid is the repartee that one positively gasps for breath. . . . At the right moment comes the first interlude, in which the Knight is wafted in dreams back to boyhood and sees himself once more a slim page. The delicate charm of this passage defies description. . . . It must be said that Elgar has written a masterpiece which does equal honour to himself and to the land that bred him.

THE DAILY MAIL.

It is the work of a man arrived at consummate mastery of his means, who has contrived a speech that exactly expresses him. . . . The new "Falstaff" has an animation in its succession of scenes of tavern revelry, highway robbery and warfare, broken only by the two little interludes gracefully hinting at old dance movements, that cannot surely for long fail to exhilarate all hearers.

THE DAILY NEWS.

"Falstaff" shows us Elgar in a new light. Though his personality is still unmistakable, he has got nearer than ever before to the school of which Strauss is the chief representative. The themes are expressive and richly humorous and pathetic. . . . The whole work is full of wonderfully rich and novel orchestration and happy touches of musical psychology, and it is finely proportioned.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE.

The chief theme, in spite of its ponderous accents, is a little featureless, but another phrase representing the boasting side of his [Falstaff's] character is a capital one, of real humour, and cleverly treated by the composer. But the purely pictorial element is of rather stronger calibre than the psychology, and in the next section, where the revelries of Falstaff and the Prince are described, the music is extremely brilliant and brimming over with merriment, the orchestration having many deft touches of humour. . . . The orchestration of "Falstaff" deserves more than a word or two. Elgar has always had a wonderful command of instrumentation, especially in tone-colour, but in this latest work he has surpassed himself. Every instrument has a virtuosic part, and the brilliance and mastery of the writing, its amazing richness and variety in colour and effect, are remarkable.

EVENING NEWS.

"Falstaff" is a work of the utmost charm and interest and a notable achievement on the part of the composer. In one respect, its instrumentation, it is still more remarkable, for the orchestra is handled with a brilliance and mastery which few composers could equal.

THE

POEM

BY

WALT WHITMAN.

SET TO MUSIC

FOR BARITONE SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

HAMILTON HARTY.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS.

TONIC SOL-FA (in the Press)

THE TIMES.

Mr. Harty's cantata, "The Mystic Trumpeter," has a directness which engages one's sympathy at once. The composer shows considerable skill in the management of simple effect, and behind the effect there is sincere feeling.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Harty's setting may find an honoured place in the repertory of many a provincial choral society. . . . It is in no wise difficult, considering the present state of choral technique, and the choruses are effective alike for singer and hearer. . . . He gives us moments of striking beauty, and often rises to a height of real poetry.

THE MORNING POST.

Mr. Hamilton Harty has treated his theme with much freshness and resource. He gives proof of his command of fancy and contrivance, yet he loses none of the charm that always distinguishes his music. The description of Paradise is of entrancing beauty, and the picture of the Crusaders lives in graphic tints. In dealing with the love section he is tender beyond imagination, and his climax of joy is spontaneous and unrestrained, giving the exact note the verse requires.

THE STANDARD.

Mr. Harty clothes all in harmonies that remove them from the commonplace. Never for a moment is he at a loss for an appropriate figure or phrase; indeed, it is his ready command of ways and means that is perhaps the most striking feature of the music. The work should find high favour with choral societies all over the kingdom.

THE DAILY MAIL.

"The Mystic Trumpeter" calls for a variety of picturesque illustrations, and this Mr. Hamilton Harty has supplied with the fulness of his facile and efficient talent. . . . The workmanship is extremely polished, and the composer seems always to hit the effect he is bent on.

THE DAILY NEWS.

The choral writing of "The Mystic Trumpeter" is such as Yorkshire loves, and the singers revelled in the broad phrases and strong harmonies. Mr. Harty's meaning is never in doubt. He has seized on the salient characteristics of each section with unerring instinct, and if he does not stop to consider the subtler shades of meaning, the poem is one which calls for broad treatment rather than ultra delicacy.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Mr. Harty has seized the musical possibilities of the text with great skill, and produced a series of inspiring mood-pictures with a refreshing youthfulness about them which is sure to make the work popular.

THE YORKSHIRE POST.

There is nothing tentative about Mr. Harty's score, every effect is assured, every passage sounds well. The appeal he makes is instantaneous, partly, no doubt, because the pictures presented by the poet are obvious enough to require no very great subtlety of treatment, but in a greater measure because of the transparent clearness of the effects. For this reason, and because of the genuine picturesque charm of the work, one is pretty certain that it will be taken up by not a few choral societies.

Playing Music at Sight as easily as Reading a Book.

Playing music at sight should be, to all pianists, as easy as reading a book. By ordinary methods, the ability to do so is only acquired as the result of years of practising for many hours daily. My System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing will enable a pianist to attain a much greater proficiency in three months of about a quarter-of-an-hour's daily practice.

The System is founded upon hitherto neglected scientific principles, and aims at the establishment of an instantaneous and automatic connection between the musical symbols and the muscular actions which are necessary to strike the correct keys.

Hundreds of students have taken my Course of Correspondence Lessons with remarkable success. A full explanation of the System, together with opinions of pupils, is given in my Booklet, sent free on application.

THE TIMES.

It is in its clear statement of facts, both in writing and by the use of simple diagrams, that Miss Julia O'Neill's book excels.

THE MORNING POST.

Her manner of putting down the facts is concise and clear. An immense amount of ground is covered in logical sequence, and the book is one of the most helpful publications as yet made. It is satisfactory to note that ear-cultivation is touched upon.

MUSICAL OPINION.

It is really surprising the amount of useful matter that Julia A. O'Neill has managed to compress within the covers of her primer, "A Practical Guide to the Theory of Music." Teachers who wish to keep abreast of the times in an educational sense will find this well-written guide calculated to help them to a knowledge of the latest and most accepted method of elementary theoretical instruction. We are pleased to note that the all-important subject of ear-culture has not been neglected in the present primer.

THE LADY.

Is a thoroughly praiseworthy attempt to present the cardinal facts of musical theory in a plain and straightforward manner to the beginner. Wholly admirable is the way the gradual formation of our present-day clefs is explained.

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

FEBRUARY 1, 1914.

MR. BASIL JOHNSON.

In our last issue we announced that Dr. C. Harford Lloyd had resigned the music-mastership (the formal title is Precentor and Instructor of Music) of Eton College, a post he has held since the resignation of Joseph Barnby in 1892, and that Mr. Basil Johnson, the music-master at Rugby School, had been appointed to succeed Dr. Lloyd. We are sure that we voice the feeling of all members of the profession in congratulating Mr. Johnson on his accession to the premier post of its kind in this country. The change is to take place at Easter this year.

It is fully worth while for musicians to be interested in the musical doings of our great public schools,* if only because it is while they are in these quarters that our future legislators and men of light and leading may be brought to look upon music as an important factor in the scheme of things. There is always in the air a hankering for government support of music, and a feeling of envy of those Continental nations whose musically disposed governments—which, of course, can only follow public opinion—by subsidies make the performance of opera and other activities of the art possible. To-day, there is talk of the establishment in this country of a Ministry of the Fine Arts with the finest Art omitted from the scheme! Our educators need educating. It may yet be possible to claim that the battle of music was won in the playing—and singing—fields of Eton.

It used to be accepted as a truism that the classes of the community from which boys of the great public schools spring are on the whole hopelessly unmusical, and it is a common experience even to-day to find that many of our public men, when called upon to address musical gatherings, depend upon an allusion to their profound musical incapacity as a form of humour calculated to propitiate the audience. But all this is not so true as it once was, and it may be claimed that the increasingly favourable attitude to music on the part of the governing classes is due to a large extent to the quiet, solid work pursued—often under great discouragement—during the last few school generations by the band of first-rate musicians who have been in charge of the music in our public schools. John Farmer did not live and work at Harrow in vain, and there are many other public school music-masters like Dr. Harford Lloyd, Dr. Buck, and Mr. Johnson, who can look back upon years of endeavour with some satisfaction at the broad result.

Public opinion and tradition as to what constitutes a liberal education are forces that inevitably direct the stream of school curricula, and these forces can only be led into new channels by slow and cautious peaceful persuasion. Festina lente.

As a full illustrated article on Rugby School appeared in our issue for June, 1905 (No. 748), we propose now to refer mainly to the career and régime of the outgoing music-master.

Mr. A. Basil N. Johnson was born in 1861. His father was the Very Rev. G. H. S. Johnson, Dean of Wells. His mother was a daughter of Admiral O'Brien. The Dean was a great scholar and mathematician. He obtained a double-first at Oxford, also the Ireland Scholarship and the Junior Mathematical Scholarship, and he was Savilian Professor of Astronomy, and Tutor and Fellow of Queen's. He died in 1881.

Mr. Johnson was educated at Malvern College, of which Institution he was organist from 1876 to 1879. In 1880 he was appointed by Sir (then Mr.) Walter Parratt to an Academical Clerkship at Magdalen College, Oxford. He obtained a second class in Classical Mods. in 1882, and took his B.A. in 1884. He next spent two years at the Royal College of Music, studying the organ under Sir Walter Parratt, harmony under Dr. Gladstone, and counterpoint under Sir Frederick Bridge; and for a short time composition under Sir Charles Stanford, and pianoforte under Mr. John Francis Barnett. He was organist at St. James's, Norlands, in 1884, and at St. Gabriel's, Pimlico, in 1885.

In 1886 he was appointed organist and master of the music at Rugby School. Here he proved himself to be a round man in a round hole, and he has held this important appointment with honour and credit to himself and to the satisfaction of generations of Rugbeians until the present day. Mr. Johnson has also been able to find time to examine for the Associated Board.

In 1891 he married Elizabeth A. Percival, daughter of the Bishop of Hereford, who, as Dr. Percival, was headmaster of Rugby School (1887-95). Amongst her other accomplishments, Mrs. Johnson is an artist of some distinction. She paints in oils and water-colours, and devotes time to pastels; some of her pictures have been exhibited in the Royal Academy and elsewhere. In 1887 Mr. Johnson became conductor of the Rugby Orchestral Society and the Philharmonic Society. The latter appointment he has held until the present day, and it is with the greatest regret that he has now to sever a connection that has yielded so much pleasure and experience to all concerned. Mr. Johnson speaks with warmth and pardonable pride of the achievements of the Philharmonic Society. It has brought before Rugby not only all the standard oratorios, including the 'St. Matthew' Passion, but it has boldly and successfully tackled modern works of the type of 'The Dream of Gerontius,' selections from Wagner, including large portions of 'Parsifal' and the 'Meistersinger,' Brahms's 'Requiem,' Parry's 'Judith,' 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' and Magnificat. 'The Dream of Gerontius' is to be performed again at the last concert to be given under Mr. Johnson on March 31 this year.

* The expression 'public schools' is commonly used in England to distinguish boys' schools established to educate the sons of middle- and upper-class parents, and especially to prepare them for the Government Services and the Universities.

MUSIC IN THE SCHOOL.

But although the Philharmonic Society has enabled Mr. Johnson to keep in intimate touch with much music that his daily tasks would exclude from his experience, it is in the famous School that his life-work so far has been accomplished. During his twenty-seven years' service, Mr. Johnson has exerted great influence in steadily and patiently advocating the claims of music as an important factor in education, and in showing how far its study can be fitted into the general scheme. As stated above, conditions and traditions in schools of the Rugby type have a strong conservative leaning. The idea that the ruts that have been found good enough for the father must also be good enough for the son has been, and is, a difficult one to withstand. Music in any form does not help to 'double-firsts', or university scholarships, the Ultima Thule of the educational curricula of a public school. Rugby, however, has a good record for its musical doings, notwithstanding the disadvantages arising from this non-utility of the subject from the customary public school standpoint. In the early days of Mr. Johnson's régime, music study could scarcely be described as popular; it had to struggle for recognition. Now all is changed, and practically every reasonable facility is afforded. Enthusiastic musical educationists must considerably allow some time for other subjects.

Rugby has been exceptionally fortunate in having headmasters gifted with a vision of the mission of music in the world. Dr. Percival ordained that the orchestral practice should be held in school-time. This substantial advantage has been maintained ever since, and has had an excellent effect upon the reputation of the orchestra in the School, besides contributing greatly to the efficiency of the players. Since its establishment there have been always from twenty to thirty boys in the orchestra, and at the present time there are twenty-six. Further, Dr. Percival initiated the remission of a certain portion of work every week for boys who sing in the chapel choir or the school concert choir. Dr. James (1895-1910) also did much for music, and Dr. David, the present headmaster, is in every way as sympathetic. Mr. Johnson states warmly that he has experienced nothing but encouragement from the headmaster, and other masters of the School. He says:

Nearly all depends on the headmaster. Practices and lessons, both of individuals and societies, must be regular and compulsory, and this must be enforced by the supreme authority. Once a good tradition is started there is no difficulty. Boys soon discover that their music is one of the best things in the world—masters also join in, and all goes ahead. School work need not be interfered with. On the contrary, inquiry and statistics show that in nearly every case the boy who is doing best in music is also doing best in general work.

The musical activities of the School are surprisingly full and varied, and they bear eloquent testimony to the position music has attained in the whole scheme of the School life. There are a chapel choir of sixty voices, a concert choir, an orchestra, a brass band, means of learning various instruments in addition to the pianoforte, a House singing-competition, concert by the combined choir and orchestra, subscription concerts at which full professional orchestras or well-known artists appear, besides organ recitals and smaller musical events.

THE SCHOOL CONCERT CHOIR.

Mr. Johnson considers that the choir has never before been in better condition than it is at the present time. At the last terminal concert, given in December, 1913, the constitution was as follows: Trebles, 53; altos, 37; tenors, 11; basses, 48; total, 149. The balance is not ideal. But it may be claimed that it has the virtue of its defects, inasmuch as it does not exclude any boys who have the ability and desire to take part. No systematic voice-training is attempted. The trebles now and again sing a scale in order to tune up, but otherwise they acquire their culture and technique by the careful performance of the music they sing. The altos are boys whose voices are on the wane, but they are kept under observation in order that they may not incur harm. Tenors are scarce, everywhere they must be when recruited from boys whose voices have not quite settled. Many boys at this stage are nondescripts, and it is safer to regard them as basses whatever their potentialities may be. The forty-eight basses on the roll are not likely to show overwhelming sonority. A few of the masters assist in the tenor and bass parts. It helps matters that all boys who are members of the choir are excused some of the school tasks—a concession which is much appreciated.

SIGHT-SINGING AND EAR-TRAINING.

Again judging from an ideal standpoint, the objective of the choir is incomplete inasmuch as it does not include definite sight-singing study and ear-training. Mr. Johnson is alive to this deficiency, as he is to the practical difficulty of dealing adequately with such a technical subject (which demands grading of pupils) during the limited time available for practice. Any attempt to enforce sight-singing study would defeat its object, because it would tend to break up the organization, with the result that there would be even less sight-singing skill in the School than there is now, for, after all, by judicious hints insinuated now and then during rehearsal, much serviceable alertness in picking up music viâ notation can be cultivated.

THE SCHOOL ORCHESTRA.

This is found to be a considerable musical influence, although its numbers are small in relation to the number of boys in the whole School. At the School concerts the orchestra not only plays orchestral selections, but it has the glory of combining with the choir. The orchestra at the December concert was constituted as follows: 9 first violins, 9 second violins, 2 violas, 6 violoncellos, 2 double-basses, 1 flute, 2 clarinets, drums and organ, 35 in all, of whom 26 were boys. The missing wind-parts were supplied by the pianoforte and organ, both skilfully managed by boys.

THE MILITARY BAND.

This is another popular and useful institution. A fair acquaintance with brass instruments can be gained without expending a great deal of time, because little training of muscles is involved. The band is attached to the Officers' Training Corps, and marches out with it. It also performs occasionally at open-air functions, and gives two or three concerts each year in the Speech-room. There are about thirty members. Mr. H. W. Pearce is the bandmaster.

CONCERTS.

The school concerts given by the combined choir and orchestra are events much appreciated. An important choral work is generally included in the programme. Below we give one of last year's programmes. On this occasion the orchestra consisted of thirty-seven performers, including ten professionals:

A series of School subscription concerts enables all who will to hear a full professional orchestra and soloists of the first rank. In 1913, Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Mukle (violoncello), Miss Edith McCullagh, Miss Helen Anderton, Mr. Hamilton Harty, and Mr. Leonard Borwick, were amongst those who appeared. Besides all the foregoing, organ recitals, with vocal music interspersed, are of frequent occurrence.

INDIVIDUAL INSTRUCTION.

During the term ended Christmas, 1913, the pupils under individual instruction were as follows: Pianoforte, 98; violin, 25; violoncello, 11; wind instruments, 33; and organ, 5; total, 172. The music masters who assist Mr. Johnson are Mr. A. H. Castle, Mr. F. Yuille Smith, Mr. G. H. Hidden, Mr. J. E. Hambleton, Mr. H. W. Pearce, and Mr. T. A. White, all of whom are most efficient and enthusiastic in their work. It will be noticed that the violoncello is much more popular than it usually is in schools. This is no doubt owing to the happy influence and style of teaching of Mr. Hambleton, the well-known and highly esteemed London professor.

HIGHER INSTRUCTION IN MUSIC.

A few boys specialise in music so far as their other studies will permit, and work at harmony, counterpoint, fugue, form, and orchestration. The following specimen examination papers prove that the course of the teaching is comprehensive, for the questions are not for show but are based upon the work done during the term :

ORCHESTRATION. 'THE EROICA.' 1910.

1. What is the key of the first movement? What is its relative minor?
2. Write on treble or bass stave the actual sounds of: (a) p. 2, clarinet part; (b) p. 2, 1st and 2nd horn parts; (c) p. 7, trumpet part; (d) p. 47, bar 9, horn lead.
3. Write bar 4 of p. 12 as for pianoforte on two staves. What chord is it?
4. Write the first two bars of the second violin part on p. 35, preserving the same actual sounds, for (a) the cor anglais, (b) a clarinet in A, (c) a horn in F, (d) a tenor trombone, (e) a viola, (f) (transposed down two octaves) for a double-bass.
5. Explain briefly: Valve horn; double reed; closed note; synonyme; harmonic series; pedal notes (of trombones).
6. What is the compass of the alto pos., the fag., the fl., and the va.?
7. In what respects does the orchestration of Beethoven differ from that of Wagner?
8. What is remarkable about bars 6 and 7 on p. 46?
9. Write the fragment on the board as a quartet for clarinet, cor anglais, horn, and bass clarinet.
10. Where does the second subject of the 'Eroica' (1st movement) begin? What key is it in?
11. What keys are passed through from bar 2, p. 8, to bar 3, p. 11?

HARMONY AND FORM. 1908.

1. Figured bass on the board.
2. Write a single chant in F minor or write a counterpoint, 3rd species (crotchets), above the C.F. on board.
3. In Beethoven's Sonata No. 8, what keys are passed through in the introduction?
4. Explain the following chords in this passage: (i.) Bar 1 on third crotchet; (ii.) bar 2 on third crotchet; (iii.) bar 6 on third crotchet; (iv.) bar 10 first bass chord.
5. Where does the second subject begin in (i.) Sonata No. 8? (Number the bar from the beginning of the Allegro); and (ii.) in No. 15? What peculiarities are presented in each case?
6. Point out how a developed Rondo differs from a 'first movement' form? Illustrate from Rondos in these three Sonatas (Nos. 8, 12, 15).
7. What is the form of (i.) Scherzo of Sonata 12; (ii.) Last movement of Sonata 12; (iii.) Slow movement of Sonata 15; (iv.) Slow movement of Sonata 8?
8. Describe the 'working-out' section of Sonata 15. What material is used, and what devices of elaboration are presented?
9. Trace the development of the 'first movement' form from the original Ternary tune.
10. What forms arose from the Binary tune?
11. What forms may be used for slow movements?
12. What were the principal changes in or additions to the form of a Sonata introduced by Beethoven?

Two boys from the School, N. F. Smith and P. M. S. Latham, have held the Nettleship (musical) scholarship, tenable at Balliol College, Oxford.

THE HOUSE SINGING COMPETITION.

This competition takes place annually, and the prize is a challenge cup. The competition is divided into two sections: (a) vocal quartet, (b) school songs. In (a) only one quartet (S.A.T.B.) from each House may compete. Each quartet has to prepare a stipulated piece and another 'own-choice' piece, which must be approved by the choirmaster. No accompaniment is allowed in this section. In (b) not less than twenty, or more than thirty boys from any House may compete. The same accompanist plays for all. The choirmaster goes at least once to each House to rehearse the quartets and the school songs, but no other professional help must be obtained.

In 1913 (March 29) the tests were (quartets):

(IMPOSED.)

'How can a bird help singing?' Abt.

(CHOSEN.)

'Dost thou idly ask?' Smart.
'He that loves a rosy cheek' G. B. Allen.
'The moon shone calmly bright' Hatton.
'O, who will o'er the downs' Pearsall.

(UNISON SINGING.)

'Let Erin remember.'
'I'm seventeen come Sunday.'
'O, Waly, Waly.'
'Sweet Polly Oliver.'
'Swiss song.'
'Charlie is my darling.'

All these unison songs had to be learned, and any one song could be chosen by the adjudicator, who is always a musician unconnected with the School. Seven Houses competed.

MUSIC IN PREPARATORY SCHOOLS.

The possibilities of musical development in the public schools are involved in the treatment accorded to the subject in the boys' preparatory schools, whose main purpose is to feed the schools for older boys. In common with all familiar with the educational ideals that govern the curricula of average schools of this type, Mr. Johnson deplors the deliberate neglect of the cultivation of the musical faculty that is so often evident in these quarters. It is seldom that innate musical capacity can be developed unless it is nurtured in early youth, that is, at the preparatory school age. Possibly a boy who indulges his musical propensities freely is in danger of losing in the scholarship and other examination races, because whereas everything that non-musical and, perhaps, tone-deaf A can do is reckoned in the score of the game, an important section of musical B's gifts, and the skill acquired at considerable cost of time, are entirely ignored.

But the preparatory schools have an awkward retort. They can say to the upper schools: 'Our educational work is almost completely shaped by your entrance examinations, which ignore musical skill and knowledge. Put music as a mark-counting subject on the same footing as Latin, Greek, and mathematics, and we will gladly exploit the musical potentiality of our boys for all it is worth. As it is, some of us as an act of grace, and as a recognition of the value of music to the individual and to humanity generally, do a great deal in this way at some risk to the kind of success that appeals most to the British parent—viz., marks obtained in examinations.'

Under existing circumstances, such a full recognition of music by the public schools is no doubt a vain crying for the moon. We must be grateful, if only in the cynical definition of gratitude, for what has already been conceded.

MUSIC = PIANOFORTE. PIANOFORTE = MUSIC.

THE SINGING-CLASS.

To most parents, learning music means learning to play the pianoforte. Has the benefit that has been derived from pianoforte teaching compensated for the misery endured by many thousands of young some of the pianoforte teaching he is compelled to endure. He says:

Boys come to Rugby who have learnt for four or five years and who do not really know their notes. They have been shown how to stumble through a piece or two, but they cannot do a thing by themselves or read one bar.

It is not that any of us desire to cold water the idea of boys learning to play an instrument. The plea is simply that the scheme of teaching should be rational, economical of time, and calculated to encourage study and educate the ear and mind. The failure of so much pianoforte teaching is the more deplorable in view of the fact that there are now within reach of every school well-tryed methods such as Mrs. Curwen's and Mr. Tobias Matthay's, which co-ordinate ear, voice, and pianoforte study pari passu, with the most beneficent results.

Mr. Johnson wisely contrives to give vent to other than his musical faculties. Stimulated no doubt by his talented wife's encouraging precept and example, he devotes some of his recreative time to painting. Below we give a reproduction people who have tried so pathetically to find an entrance to the temple of music only and solely through this, to them, delusive door? And all the time Nature has provided a much finer instrument on which, without having to wait for special muscular and nervous development, the child can at once play instinctively and expressively. All early definite musical study should be via voice and ear, not by wrestling with obstinate muscles. So the Singing Class scientifically and artistically treated can be the means of salvation of the great majority of school pupils. It involves no time to be set apart for private practice, it can best be taught collectively, and it provides the wonderful inspiration of comradeship.

of one of his efforts in this sphere of art, taken almost at random from his portfolio.

Then as an amateur actor he has shown an aptitude that has led to his being cast for leading parts in plays got up by members of the School staff and their families for performance before the boys. He has appeared in the following rôles: Lord Thirlmere, in 'My Lord in Livery' (S. Theyre Smith); Cheviot Hill, in 'Engaged' (W. S. Gilbert); Mr. Cattermole, in 'The Private Secretary' (Charles Hawtrey); Sergeant Bouncer, in 'Box and Cox' (Maddison Morton and F. C. Burnand); and the Colonel in 'Patience' (Gilbert and Sullivan).

May Mr. Johnson be as happy and successful at Eton as he has been at Rugby!

À PROPOS OF SCHÖNBERG'S FIVE ORCHESTRAL PIECES.

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

There were an occasional hiss and a spasmodic ggle or two during the performance of Schönberg's five Orchestral Pieces at Queen's Hall on January 17; but there was nothing like the noisy approval that greeted them at the Promenade Concert of a couple of seasons ago. There was, indeed, considerable applause. This was put down by some people to our pleasant English habit of not being rude to an artist to his face, no matter how much we may dislike his art. But I think it meant more than that; people were astonished to find how much of this music they could really understand and enjoy. This second performance, being no doubt more adequately prepared, and having the great advantage of being conducted by the composer,—who is at present perhaps the only man in the world who knows that the music is intended to suggest,—certainly gave every one a very different impression of the work. Music of this sort evidently requires that may be called the most perfect focussing: on the previous occasion the different timbres were clearly out of focus for a great part of the time. Many passages looked one thing on paper, and sounded quite another under the composer's handling. I suppose no one in the audience understood or liked the music throughout; but most people felt that Schönberg, besides being a confident orchestral technician, had something quite new to say, and something that could be said in no other idiom but this. That is probably as far as anyone could get. Even those who had familiarised themselves with the score in advance were unable to catch more than an occasional gleam of beauty. It was rather like the experience one sometimes have with the telephone, with an odd minute or two of lucid conversation coming out of a blur of irrelevant noise, as a train runs into the murk and reek of a tunnel and out into the sunlight again.

It is too late in the day to call Schönberg either madman or a conscious charlatan. We now have too much fine music from his pen to be able to doubt that he has one of the finest musical heads of our day. What is the explanation, then, of these latest departures of his, in which he seems to be the first blush to be throwing over half the things that music has hitherto meant for us? Is it we who are too slow, or he who is going on too fast? We need a leader, as John Russell Lowell said; but he must not be on the other side of the ball. Is not Schönberg on the other side of the ball now, and so of little use to us?

Our difficulty with him is not his harmony in itself, but the ideas that prompt the harmony. No one can doubt that the field of expression open to music is still as vast as the whole field that has been opened in the last three hundred years; the music of our grandchildren will be as different from ours as the music of Stravinsky is different from that of Buxtehude. Certain forms will be exhausted: certain lines will have to come to an end from the sheer impossibility of producing them any further. Painting and sculpture have already exhausted the possibilities of certain of their lines. Take the problem of the individual nude, for example. The proportions of the human body remain to-day what they were for the ancient Greeks. Expression of the beauty of these proportions—considered purely by themselves,—can consist of little more than a balancing of limbs on both sides of a vertical and a horizontal axis. Though the number of such balancings is no doubt theoretically infinite, in practice they resolve themselves into quite a small number. That number has been exhausted in the course of the centuries, with the result that it is virtually impossible to-day to make a statue of the individual nude that does not suggest and seem to be imitated from some statue of the past. I am considering, of course, only statues of a particular kind, those in which no facial psychology comes into play, no symbolism of pose or gesture, no literary or other imaginative allusion,—the statues that aim simply at making a beautiful picture of shapely and harmoniously grouped limbs. Those groupings, I repeat, are not indefinitely extensible; and on this line, at any rate, sculpture has come to the end of its resources. Nude figures of this type can still be made, as sonatas and symphonies can still be made; but like the latter they invariably suggest the copying, with minor variations, of some great prototype. It is for this reason that the futurist sculptors and painters have declared war on the nude,—the mere exploitation of a number of standardised linear formulæ.

Now there is a great deal in our modern music that will find its way sooner or later to the scrap-heap. Expression on the old lines is becoming too facile: there is a sort of common fund of emotion and of technique that any reasonably gifted musician can exploit.

M. Romain Rolland, in his 'Jean Christophe,' turns savagely on the emotional clichés of the German composers,—the endless babbling about Spring murmurs and Spring messages and Flower Greetings and all the rest of it, that runs through the German song in particular from Schubert to our own day. M. Rolland calls this kind of thing the 'national lie.' But it is not only German music that has its national lie; and there is a more insidious lie than that,—the cosmopolitan lie, the pillaging and vending of an international fund of sentiment and technique.

From this lie the really original minds in music are anxious to escape. We should be glad to escape with them; but unfortunately we cannot grasp the truth except with the help of some portion of the lie. That is to say, if a composer cuts us adrift from all the clichés of the past, we are utterly lost. And this, I think, is what Schönberg is doing,—and in the process losing himself as well.

There can be no abstract limit placed to the development of what we can still call, for convenience' sake, dissonance in music; every student knows that each generation sees the safe acclimatising of certain new harmonies that at their first coming were regarded as anarchistic aliens. The modern ear has lost all horror of any particular chord as a chord; familiarity will reconcile us to anything. But what we are bound to ask for is a recognisable logic in the passage from chord to chord, especially from discord to discord. Here again I am with the futurists of all sorts. There will have to be a 'speeding-up' in all artistic expression. We have quicker brains than our grandfathers; we have a much vaster store of memorised artistic sensation than they. We are prepared to take things for granted that a hundred years ago would have to be stated in laborious detail. Our ancestors were brave old fellows, but still they walked the earth: in these aerial days there is no need for us to go as slow-footedly from point to point as they did. Especially in music, where the expressive medium is not fixed, as it is in poetry, but can grow from age to age as humanity's vision grows, is it possible, and indeed necessary, for us to take quick cuts across the fields where our grandfathers would tramp steadily round by the high road. Sibelius's stark and vigorous fourth Symphony is one of the most remarkable illustrations I know of this new tendency: both ideas and expression seem filed down to their barest essentials. Schönberg's later music, I take it, aims at the same swiftness and concision. He goes from harmonic point A to point B by the most direct route,—sometimes too direct for us, whom his pace leaves breathless. I think it is his annihilation of the intermediate stages between his discords that accounts for our inability to follow him sometimes. It stands to reason that every chord imaginable must be capable of being brought into relation with every other imaginable chord, just as by step-by-step introductions by friends, the Bishop of London could ultimately shake hands with the King of the Cannibal Islands. But at present there are limits to the mental abbreviations of which we are capable in music. Browning sometimes confuses us for a moment by omitting prepositions and relative pronouns, for example:

'For I am ware it is the seed of act,
God holds appraising in His hollow palm,
Not act grown great thence on the world below,
Leafage and branchage, vulgar eyes admire.'

The present trouble with Schönberg, it seems to me, is this omission of the prepositions and relative pronouns of harmony; we go from clause to clause by a jerk instead of by the transitions we have grown used to. Shall we ever get used to Schönberg's method? That I doubt: for it is a quite new thing in the history of music for a composer to be beyond the comprehension of progressive musicians. Richard Specht put this very well in a recent number of Der Merker. In the music of every original thinker there is an occasional something that requires looking at or hearing more than once: but there has never been anything yet, in Wagner or Strauss or Debussy or Ravel, that a competent and open-minded musician could not assimilate after a few attempts. When we find that after fifty attempts at certain pages of the later Schönberg we are no nearer understanding them than we were at first we are justified in asking whether it is possible for one man to be so far ahead of the whole musical world, or whether there is not some defect in his thinking as well as in ours. Perhaps the truth will turn out to be that when Schönberg fails it is because he has not seen his vision clearly enough; for I believe that any vision clearly seen will not only find its right expression but will irresistibly appeal to all the rest of us. There are some strangely beautiful things in these Five Orchestral Pieces, but also, I think, some fumbling with ideas only half realised, some conscious padding of the texture. I doubt whether Schönberg himself would always detect an alteration of, or addition to, his score.

The Five Orchestral Pieces, Op. 16, by Arnold Schönberg, referred to by Mr. Newman, were performed under the direction of the composer at the Queen's Hall (by Sir Henry Wood's Orchestra on January 17 :

1. Vorgefühle (Presentiments).
2. Vergangenes (The Past).
3. Der wechselnde Akkord (The Changing Chord).
4. Peripetie (Peripetia).
5. Das obligate Recitativ (The Obbligato Recitative).

Until he had rehearsed the orchestra for this performance the composer had not heard the Pieces. The previous and first performance of the Pieces in any country was given under Sir Henry Wood's baton at the Promenade Concert on September 3, 1912. Their reception on that occasion is described on p. 647 of our October, 1912, number.

Mrs. Newmarch (the writer of the analytical notes for the programme of the recent performance) says the pieces 'are published without any verbal programme which might give a clue to their poetic and emotional content. Herr Schönberg has, however, furnished me with the sub-titles given on this programme [see above], which do not appear in the score, a concession that may prove rather helpful to those who are bewildered by the strangeness of the music, which seeks to express for us [quoting from a criticism by Karl Linke] "all that dwells in us subconsciously like a dream; which is a great fluctuant power, and is built upon none of the lines that are familiar to us; which has a rhythm, as the blood has its pulsating rhythm, as all life in us has its rhythm; which has a tonality, but only as the sea or the storm has its tonality; which has harmonies, though we cannot grasp or analyse them, nor can we trace its themes. . . . All its technical craft is submerged, made one and indivisible with the content of the work. We can no longer differentiate between technique and idea, because the composer attains to an unresting intermingling of both. There is no working-out; any attempt to separate what is inseparable would be to misunderstand this music."

The Pieces are scored for two piccolos, two flutes (three are used in Nos. 4 and 5), three oboes, cor anglais, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double-bassoon, four horns (six in No. 4), three trumpets, four trombones, tuba, xylophone, gong, timpani, bass drum, harp, celesta, and strings. All the numbers end in discord and abound in chromatic scales, and (says Mrs. Newmarch) 'of course in perfect fifths, emphasised by being given out fortissimo by trombones; while naturals and flats, and naturals and sharps, clash in all directions.'

THE RUST CASE: ITS ENDING AND ITS MORAL.

By M.-D. CALVOCRESSI.

M. Vincent d'Indy's edition of twelve pianoforte sonatas by F. W. Rust, accurately transcribed from the original manuscripts, has appeared. Doubt is no longer possible. All Dr. Neufeldt's assertions as to the falsifications introduced by Dr. Wilhelm Rust in the works of his grandfather were strictly founded on facts. And the admiration bestowed upon Rust's Sonatas, until the recent late when the truth was discovered, went to works grievously adulterated both in form and in style.

Now that we have the genuine texts to deal with, the majority of music-lovers will certainly agree with M. Vincent d'Indy and Dr. Neufeldt in deeming that Rust's music deserved better than to be garbled and tricked out with spurious frills; that, judged on its true merits, it is still capable of holding its own. And now that the forgeries have been exposed, there is no reason for striking the composer out of the list of the praiseworthy, into which he had gained admission on a false plea.

Therefore, as far as Rust is concerned, the matter ends. We have only to rejoice in acknowledging the issue of a very arduous quest or truth.

But the story told in my article in the Musical Times of January 1, forcibly draws our attention towards two more general problems: the first concerning the spirit in which works of art are judged, and the second concerning the standards by which we profess to judge them.

One of the characteristic tendencies of this period is our eagerness to make amends for the results of past ignorance and injustice. In France alone, musicians and writers have recently indicated the rights of many little-known, forgotten, or misjudged composers like Marc-Antoine Charpentier, Lulli, Rameau, Berlioz, Liszt, Moussorgsky, M. Erik Satie, and others, besides Rust. And a remarkable point is that in many of these cases, apologists incline to take into account not merely what the composers have actually achieved, but also what their influence or their example has enabled others to achieve: in other words, to consider in them not only the actual creators, but also the precursors. This, as a principle, is altogether sound. Yet if the application be carried too far, it may result in a case of summum jus summa injuria: perhaps for the simple reason that it is most difficult to express any critical judgment without overshooting the mark.

When one considers an artist as a precursor, it often happens that one leaves the sterling merits of his output in the background. For instance, many who judge Liszt as a composer with a severity that perhaps they themselves feel to be excessive, esteem that they make sufficient atonement by adding that 'he was a great prophet, though unable to enter the promised land,' or words to that effect. On the other hand, not a few will overlook—as in the case of Rust's adulterated Sonatas—actual weaknesses on the plea that the work is pregnant with innovations which others since have carried out. Such points of view may be justifiable as far as the appreciation of an artist is concerned, but it stands to reason that they have nothing to do with musical appreciation pure and simple.

Yet again, there are many great artists whom it is quite impossible to consider as precursors in any respect; who might rather be said to have closed behind them the paths they followed. Shall there be, then, two orders of standards for judging creators?

But to make the matter short, let us consider an even more important point. The question, in the end, proves to be one of history versus æsthetics. It often happens that we judge musical works according to circumstantial evidence far more than by internal evidence, if we only knew it. The principle adduced above may lead to the obviously absurd conclusion that the same work, if written at a given time, deserves admiration, but deserves none if written threescore years later. And that, preposterous though it seems, would be true if the assumed case were possible. But style and ideals are ceaselessly evolving, and what has been the free expression of genius becomes in the following generations mere routine. 'Be sure,' Schumann wrote, 'that if a Mozart reappeared among us, he would write after the fashion of Chopin, rather than after that of Mozart.' Therefore, as the true creative artist must be 'the parent of his ideas and not their fabricator,' we may hold for certain that a work written by Mozart, and a work written by another musician at a later period in Mozart's style, could never be the same thing: the second would lack genuineness, be fabricated and not created. And the sensitiveness, the taste, the critical sense upon which we pride ourselves ought to enable us to acknowledge the difference. But then, the Rust case comes to show, as stated in the conclusion of the foregoing article, how precarious our standards are, and how easily we may be led astray.

It is a comfort to know that certain critics, like Mr. J. S. Shedlock, remained sceptical. But other excellent musicians,—like M. Vincent d'Indy, who devoted elaborate and laudatory notices to the spurious Sonatas, and M. Paul Dukas, who in the Revue Hebdomadaire (July 14, 1894) professed his admiration for the works of Rust as published by his grandson,—were little troubled by mistrust.

Since, then, judges of so great experience may so easily fail to acknowledge a fabrication, are we not justified in fearing that very often we judge according to circumstantial evidence only? Thus it was found easier and more convincing, when it came to identifying Leonardo's rediscovered 'Mona Lisa,' to lay stress upon the cracks in the panel or the varnish, upon the seals, stamps and so forth, than to adduce arguments founded on the painting itself.

I have often wondered whether a single paragraph would ever have been devoted to the 'Jena' Symphony but for the fact of its attribution to Beethoven; and how far internal evidence alone would have enabled us to discern in it, even in a feeble measure, the lion's mark. Now, perhaps, looking backwards, it might have done so: exactly as we are able to see to-day that a musician of fifty or even twenty years ago was a 'precursor.'

But when a work of art appears, are we before judging it to wait until further works by the same artist or by others show us whether it contains beauties, points of interest which otherwise we should fail to discover?

In practice, it often occurs thus: and thereby, the infirmity of our judgment is but more clearly shown. If an artist be merely a 'precursor,' viz., one who opens paths without treading them, then there is no intrinsic beauty in his work; and no matter how others, or himself in later works, achieve beauty by the means that he has ushered in, that work deserves, from the æsthetical point of view, no further consideration. But if, when a work appears, we are struck by the idea 'This is not sufficiently carried out, but what paths it opens!' the mistake is ours: the artist treads the path.

All these uncertainties can but inspire the critic with very unpleasant feelings. We are accustomed to talk of form, of style, and the rest, as of things definite and beyond doubt—things that are our standards. It is in the name of the principles of form and of style that we condemn or extol music. We are convinced not only that such things exist, but that we know them sufficiently well to pronounce upon their presence, their absence, their excellence, or their shortcomings. And we never notice that the principles we make so much of are deduced from the works themselves—or, more accurately, from a number of works selected as models—so that finally we are for ever begging the question: borrowing from art laws in the name of which we pretend to rule art.

Let us attempt to define form, or, rather, borrowing from Sir Hubert Parry's article under that word in 'Grove's Dictionary,' admit form to be the outcome of 'the means by which unity and proportion are arrived at in musical works.' Form, then, is unity and proportion: not in the abstract, but as we see them in works of art. If we can find unity and proportion in a work in which an alien hand has inserted motives, periods, and whole sections, which is carried to twice its original length by spurious additions which fail to shock even men who are not unwarrantably acknowledged as experts in musical matters, then the fundament of our methods of judging form is very untrustworthy. We sneer at the ineptitude of those conductors of yore who thought it permissible to replace sections of certain of Beethoven's symphonies by sections borrowed from other symphonies of his; and yet, if ever a document came forth conclusively to prove that what has hitherto passed as the Scherzo of one symphony is in fact the Scherzo of another symphony, nothing would remain but to bow to the inevitable and recast, in the Beethoven literature, all that refers to the wonderful fitness of that Scherzo as part of the whole to which it was thought to belong.

The same is to be said as regards style. 'Style,' says Sir Hubert Parry,* 'is the sum of the appearances of all the factors which make up a work of art or any living thing . . . We can hardly imagine such a monstrosity in nature as a tree made up half in the style of an apple-tree and half of an orange. Yet the law of consistency in art is just as essential and logical as in things organic. The worst fault in style is the mixing up of types which are especially apt to different groups of conditions, different situations, and different attitudes of mind.'

But in the Rust case we have had the monstrosity, half apple-tree and half orange; the mixing up of W. Rust's types and of his grandson's, apt to the different conditions and different attitudes of mind. And the monstrosity has been passed by many experts without a qualm.

Indeed, it seems as though the matter-of-fact standards afforded by the study of history were hardly more positive than the arbitrary standards of purely critical judgment. Reverting to Schumann's axiom, and understanding that each artistic style belongs to a period, to this period, and can flourish in that period only, we understand how glaringly improbable it was that Dr. Rust's chromatic style and romantic effects should have belonged to the output of a composer who died in 1796. And we shall wonder how it can have come to pass that the absurdity should have passed unnoticed by so many. But if it had truly been the case, we should have been compelled to revise our notions as to the history of the evolution of musical style, and the principles which we deduce from its study.

Without the help of circumstantial evidence, indeed, we are often reduced to straits. Two or three years ago, the Paris Société Musicale Indépendante maliciously gave a concert of music, ancient and modern, by authors whose names were not revealed, inviting the audience to write on slips of paper the conjectured authorship of the several works. Wonderful perplexity ensued, of course, and startling results were achieved. For instance, a majority ascribed to Schumann part-songs by a moderately-gifted amateur composer of to-day who found in the mistake a welcome solace from and a ready answer to, the supercilious judgments usually passed on his works by professional critics. Would a majority of experts fall into the same trap? I could name at least one professional critic who did not strike upon the authorship of M. Ravel's 'Valse nobles et sentimentales,' produced for the first time on that occasion.

There are excellent musicians who aver that the famous chord in Beethoven's Choral Symphony, that consists of the seven notes of the diatonic scale, is the outcome of a mere misprint. Having once alluded to that chord with reference to a similar effect in Balakirev's 'En Bohême,' I received from the Russian master a letter in which he said as much most emphatically; and I must acknowledge that I have experienced some discomfort when other Russian composers earnestly assured me that some of the chords which I found most wonderful in the original versions of Moussorgsky's music were likewise to be ascribed to the engraver's carelessness.

If any conclusion is to be drawn from the foregoing facts and remarks, I would say that we critics should remember La Fontaine's fable of the sculptor who, having hewn out of a block of marble a statue of Jupiter, felt himself stricken with awe before the image, and tremblingly worshipped it. That is exactly the way in which we act with regard to art laws.

If we take nothing for granted we shall never be able to form a critical opinion; but we—and with us the public—generally take too much for granted, and in too absolute a manner. That there is, in matters pertaining to aesthetics, no such thing as an arrogant imperative is often forgotten by those who pronounce judgments and those who blindly believe in authoritative judgments. The Rust case has come in time to give us once more a warning at the moment when dogmatic aesthetics, if not wholly overthrown, are trembling in the balance. For that reason alone one might well rejoice: the question, so far as the welfare of musical art is concerned, is vital.

THE REFORM OF CHURCH MUSIC: A REVIEW OF THE MORNING POST CORRESPONDENCE.

By WALTER G. ALCOCK.

The correspondence on this ever-green subject which has recently appeared in the Morning Post, has naturally exhibited a wide range of opinion, and while the very obvious and no less serious difficulties offered by the situation seem to be well understood by some contributors, it has been a glorious opportunity for the faddist, and one of which he has taken full advantage. There is probably no branch of music upon which opinion so widely varies, while the side issues are so numerous that it seems impossible to find a solution which shall satisfy everyone. So long as the clergy disagree on matters of ritual, &c., it will be difficult indeed to frame a musical scheme which shall appeal to all. Some are ready to encourage a musical service, while others would grudgingly permit but the simplest effort.

A point which seems to have escaped notice is that as in religion, so in Church music, women (who form the bulk of the average congregation) take a different point of view from men, who care less for sentiment.

The first question is, Is music to be admitted to the Church Service? If it is, then Dr. Hadow is right in contending that 'we may freely admit music of all periods provided that it attains the requisite standard of reverence and dignity.' But then a second question arises, Who is to be the arbiter as to what constitute reverence and dignity, the clergy or the musician? Here it is important to point out that no secular musician can quite understand the position, and with the advance of the art of solo-playing, the organist is in some danger of introducing an atmosphere alien to the Church. But if religious motive be not always a strong characteristic of the average organist, still less frequently do we find music taken seriously as a part of the equipment of the clergy, nor do they appreciate so often as they ought the high moral value of fine music adequately rendered. Though the necessity is not equal in each case, at least a tolerant attitude, or failing that, a confession of ignorance on the subject, might reasonably be expected of highly-educated men. The best way would seem to be to entrust the music to the expert, and to judge by results. If unworthy, the remedy is all too easy! This is said in no ungenerous spirit, and any organist knows only too well how the drudgery of his work is prone to blind him to his mission. The clergy, too, have little time amid the distractions of parish work for an art which in itself can fill a lifetime. The organist is often a nervous and introspective person, liable to think he is misunderstood. Too often, also, his work and enthusiasm are damped by those in authority, whose frequent interference and want of musical knowledge—of which Sir Charles Stanford in his able letter complains—often add to the organist's difficulties. Such a sentiment as that expressed in the Morning Post by 'Ex-Vicar' should never have been written. He actually says, 'I make bold to say that a vicar is where he is to protect the unmusical but spiritually minded from the organist and choir.' Are there no musical and spiritually minded in the congregation? Further comment is needless, except that being no longer a vicar, the author of those words will have transferred to some other sphere of work his capacity for doing untold moral harm to those less fortunate than himself.

As to the choice of music for Church use, Dr. Hadow's opinion (quoted above) seems to cover the ground. The faddist would have us believe that nothing worthy has been written since Elizabethan days; with him a thing—be it chair, table, vase, folk-song, or a church anthem—has only to be old, and he at once accepts it as beautiful. That vast quantities of vapid and unworthy stuff have been, and are being, produced must sorrowfully be admitted, and it is strange how rarely an acceptable example appears. Even then it takes almost a surgical operation to gain for it the barest recognition. Dr. Bairstow's anthem, 'Save us, Lord, waking,' has taken twelve years to become known, though it may claim to be a model of the legitimate development of accompanied Church music. When the difficulties which Mendelssohn encountered in producing Bach's 'Passion' music in Germany, and later the struggle by enthusiasts in England on behalf of Bach's music, are considered, it is small wonder that the desire to raise the public taste in Church music should be so unproductive.

There can be no doubt that much of our trouble may be traced to the organ, and to the efforts made by many organists to emulate the effect of a Cathedral service. It is seldom realised how much of this effect is due to the vast space and the echo of the cathedral, and that nothing can take the place of these factors. The church organist had far better devote his greater energies to the choir, his rehearsals being as far as possible unaccompanied. When once his choir gains independence, he will find it possible to introduce vocal Church music of all schools, to which the splendid examples of more recent accompanied works will give variety. Mr. Childs Clarke, the Succentor of St. Paul's Cathedral, in an excellent letter, rightly claims that most Cathedrals include specimens of all periods in their service lists. But from sheer force of habit even they, too, often give a hearing to worthless specimens, many of which might be relegated to the back shelves of the library—where perchance they may one day be rediscovered by some misguided enthusiast and acclaimed priceless!

But it is possible that the movements towards reform have not infrequently gone too far. If some of the suggestions in our contemporary were adopted, we should soon find the pendulum swinging in the opposite direction, with a plea for music with some inherent semblance of beauty.

The question as to the best medium for the rendering of the Psalms has resulted in the formation of two hostile camps, and probably anything like agreement is impossible. Many contributors would have nothing but Gregorian tones, and proclaim the Anglican chant as being in every way inartistic and inadequate. The Anglican chant purist prefers a single chant, as it adapts itself more readily to change of meaning, antiphonal singing, &c. Against this it may be argued that little musical interest can be got into seven bars. The triple and quadruple variety are unwieldy and unnecessary, involving all kinds of doubling back to fit odd verses. Of late several special systems have been published, each claiming to be the only legitimate medium for these noble songs of the Church. The idea of the Psalms for the whole month being sung to the music of a single composer could hardly be attractive, and yet at least one such arrangement has appeared. These new methods have yet to prove their worth, but if they can simplify pointing, and more artistically render the meaning of the words, they will indeed be welcomed.

The musical settings of the Canticles constitute a serious danger to the average organist, who can seldom resist an attractive and so-called brilliant organ part, at the expense of the choir, who after all are the proper medium for this part of the Liturgy. The organ is, or should be, subordinate, though this need not preclude an occasional outburst. Indeed, the much-maligned instrument may greatly intensify the meaning of some point.

The Communion Office is not so well served with musical settings as it should be. So few composers seem able to approach, e.g., the central portion of the Creed with anything like dignity. The necessity for reverence in the treatment of the words 'And was made Man, and was crucified . . . ' should give pause to anyone before he commits his thoughts to paper. In the Morning Post correspondence we find two widely different opinions regarding the setting of Merbecke. One suggests that it should be always used, while another openly rejoices that after constant use it is being replaced by other settings. It has fortunately become the custom to avoid repetition of words in the Canticles and Communion Service. Exceptions there must be, and the repetition of the words, 'Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace,' in Stanford in A, is a notable and artistic example. Fugal settings of the Gloria to the Canticles are now seldom written, and much has been gained in concision and clarity by the change of method.

In considering anthems we are faced by collections embracing all periods and formidable in their variety of style and difficulty. But examples suitable for use by a village choir or that of a cathedral can be chosen from every school. Of course an honest attempt should be made to include only the best. The earlier composers naturally wrote mostly for voices only, and this variety is much neglected, possibly on account of the great advance in organ-building in this country. Of the later writers, S. S. Wesley has probably reached the highest plane. Of his works suitable for Church use may be mentioned 'Wash me thoroughly,' 'Cast me not away,' 'All go unto one place,' &c. The organ part of these is never predominant, though it is often independent. Wesley used the organ with better judgment than any before him, never losing sight of its dignity and its balance with the voices. The use, as anthems, of numbers selected from oratorios, &c., may be perfectly legitimate; indeed, such music has for long been recognised and accepted by all. As a rule they will require an organist of some skill in adapting the accompaniment to his instrument. But choice should rather fall on examples conceived as pure Church music.

The consideration of the Hymn-tune offers many difficulties. From being once a broad and manly expression of noble words it has declined to what is so often a pretty part-song. Surely much of this deterioration may be traced to the sentimentality of modern hymns? But however good hymn or tune may be, the combination can seldom be artistic, as only in rare cases can the tune suit every verse. The absurd mutilation of some verses is hardly atoned for by the fact that the composer fitted the tune to the first verse only, and recourse to footnotes often muddles both choir and congregation. Multitudes of examples may be seen by a cursory glance at any hymn-book. The undoubted fact remains, however, that the poorest of hymns and tunes may by tender associations be cherished by many, and this must sympathetically be allowed for. The hymn is, after all, the people's property, and experiments, made with the best intention, have generally failed. It should be borne in mind that music in Church is to be a help to the worshipper, and his susceptibilities should be considered. They will be found commensurate with his musical understanding. Musical education has much ground to cover before the best forms will be the most popular.

After such criticisms it will be asked, How is the evil to be remedied? Our musical institutions are doing what they can to train Church organists, though it may be questioned if they can replace the system of articulated pupils who, living in the organ-loft, and becoming imbued with the true spirit of the best Church music, took with them into the parish churches of the country the authentic traditions of a great school. But if this system cannot be revived, a Training School for Church Musicians might solve the difficulty. There Church organ-playing, accompaniment, choir-training, and orthodox principles of Church music should be the subjects of study. It is gratifying to observe a growing desire on the part of some of the younger clergy to recognise the importance of music in Church, and to take an intelligent and sympathetic interest in the work of the organist. One thing remains clear: without the co-operation of the clergy as a whole, little can be done. If only they would recognise the importance of music to religion, and accept the fact that though it may not always appeal to them, it is well-nigh essential to innumerable worshippers, there would be some reasonable ground for hope. At present, the whole question seems to resolve itself into one of personal opinion, where the weakest goes to the wall. Another possible solution might be found in a conference of the leading clergy and organists, when the subject could be considered calmly in all its bearings.

The (Crystal Palace) Festivals Committee, representing four of the larger bodies that hold annual musical festivals at the Palace, has arranged the following dates for the coming season: The London Sunday School Choir, June 17; the National Union of School Orchestras, June 20; the Tonic Sol-fa Association, June 27; the National Temperance Choral Union, July 11. The chairman of the committee is Mr. George Merritt, the hon. secretary, Mr. T. H. Warner.

Occasional Notes.

Dr. Coward's recently published book on 'Choral technique and interpretation' (Novello & Co.) has been for long overdue. The author has made his great reputation as a choral trainer all over the English-speaking world, and there has been for some years past a natural and widespread desire on the part of choral conductors of all grades to know something of the methods by which Dr. Coward's masterly results have been attained. They have now before them a full revelation, and it will be found that the definition of genius as the art of taking infinite pains receives great support. So far as we are aware, there exists no such elaborate treatise on the topic of choral technique in any language. Later we shall review the book more fully.

On January 1, Wagner's 'Parsifal' became public property, and in the first weeks of the New Year this 'Bühnenweihfestspiel' has been staged and enthusiastically received at Berlin, Barcelona, Barmen, Bologna, Bremen, Buda-Pest, Cologne, Elberfeld, Freiburg, Kiel, Madrid, Mayence, Milan, Monte Carlo, Palermo, Paris, Prague, Rome, St. Petersburg, Turin, Vienna, and other towns. Berlin had its 'Royal Parsifal' and its 'Democratic Parsifal' (at the Royal Opera and at the German Theatre). At Bologna a commemoration plate is to be placed in the vestibule of the Town Theatre, bearing the following inscriptions: 'November 1, 1871, first performance of "Lohengrin"; January 1, 1914, first performance of "Parsifal." Prague is the only town where 'Parsifal' was performed on January 1 at two different theatres: at the Neue Deutsche Theatre (in German), and at the Czech National Theatre (in the Czech language).

In England the so-called desecration of 'Parsifal' has brought down a light shower of protests from the stern Wagnerites—or should we say Wagnerists and Wagnerettes (are we not all Wagnerites)? We suspect, however, that many protesters would have been sympathisers had fate thrown them among the majority whose financial state makes the pilgrimage to Bayreuth for ever impossible. For the sake of that majority we are glad to announce that on the second of this month the much-heralded first stage-performance of Wagner's 'Parsifal' in this country is to take place at Covent Garden. As will readily be believed by those who are familiar with the ideals and practices of the Grand Opera Syndicate, no pains are being spared to make this and subsequent performances of the season equal to the best that the world can at present provide. The cast for the first night is magnificent. At the time of writing it is to be as follows:

Parsifal	Heinrich Hensel
Kundry	Eva van der Osten
Amfortas	Paul Bender
Gurnemanz	Paul Knupfer
Klingsor	August Kieis

The conductor is Herr Arthur Bodanzky. Mr. Joseph Harker (for the scenery), Signor Attilio Comelli and Mr. Comyns Carr (for the costumes), Prof. Wirk (the Bayreuth stage-manager), and Prof. Hugo Rudel (the Bayreuth chorus-master) have been brought into service.

Twelve performances of 'Parsifal' will be given, the first and last being on February 2 and March 7. The latter date marks the end of the season. The repertory also includes 'Tristan und Isolde' (five times), 'Die Walküre' (three times), 'Die Meistersinger' (four times), and Méhul's 'Joseph' (four times)—an opera which has long fallen into disuse except in Germany.

At the beginning of 1914 all Wagner's works became public property, with the exception of three of the master's melodies, 'Attente,' 'Dors, mon enfant,' and 'Mignonne.' The rights of these three songs were purchased in 1870 by Messrs. Durand & Co., Paris, and issued for the first time during the same year. According to the Berne Convention, the country where a work was published for the first time is considered as the country of its origin. Hence the copyright of these songs comes under the French law, which protects them during fifty years after the composer's death.

The performance of Arnold Schönberg's 'Five orchestral pieces' at Queen's Hall on January 17 left some thousands of people in a state of either indignation or bewilderment. The least enviable were those whose duty it was to register their opinion publicly in the Press. Their responsibility was to their present readers, to their future readers, and to themselves. On the whole, they recognised that sarcastic witticism was a form of shirking, and they tackled the problem bravely. We give below some examples of the effect of the new music on their experienced perceptivities:

It was impossible to resist the conclusion that the composer is in deadly earnest; and, further, if only on account of the reticence of his score and its economy of ways and means, that he is a musician who is actuated by a higher motive than a mere desire to stagger humanity.—Standard.

This we are invited to accept as progress in art. It is nothing of the kind; it is retrograde. Hundreds of years have been spent in perfecting the art of expression by sound so that a definite meaning can be conveyed by constantly expanding terms. The process of development is still going on. . . . Now we are asked to believe that this logical development of the musical language is unnecessary, and that it is only requisite to produce a series of aimless, elementary, and ugly sounding notes to convey a definite meaning.—Morning Post.

Considered purely as a piece of orchestral colour, these Five Pieces rank easily above all that has been done by others. Schönberg's technique of the orchestra is astounding. Not one note of the score seems assigned to a certain instrument simply because such is the custom of this or that composer. Every detail has been carefully considered, and bears the stamp of a powerful individuality. What leaves the listener unsatisfied is the extraordinary way in which Schönberg chooses to condense his ideas.—Manchester Guardian.

Eighteen months ago, when one heard these pieces for the first time, they were a puzzle; now the puzzle seems quite insoluble—indeed, such a riddle is it all that I for one will not venture to say whether his 'reforms' are praiseworthy or not, or whether they are likely to tend.—Daily News.

The thing which really makes one hope that these Five Pieces may become intelligible is the consistency of their form. While Schönberg throws all the conventions of harmony to the winds, he clings tenaciously in all but one (No. 3) to simple figures of rhythm, which would seem only too obvious if the mind were not being distracted all the time by the strange conglomerations of harmony.—The Times.

With all its protoplasmic quality, with all its vagueness and abruptness, this music, so eternally quiet and subdued, seemed to fulfil a purpose, and we are quite prepared to believe the fault is ours that that purpose did not show itself in perfect clearness at once. In any case, we refuse to regard Schönberg as a musical anarchist on the strength of these Five Pieces, and though we confess to a strong preference for the beautiful sextet, we yet are quite prepared to hear the Five Pieces again. Indeed, it would be a pleasure. Daily Telegraph.

If they made something of a less sensation than had probably been expected, we put this down more to the curious reticence of the orchestration than to any lack of daring in the actual writing itself. The dynamic plane of the music is decidedly a low one, and in consequence the harshness of the composer's discordant method strikes the ear far less than would otherwise have been the case.—Pall Mall Gazette.

As to the abuse of the piccolos, it is a strange and regrettable little characteristic in one whose generally exquisite sense for rare and precious timbre places a German musician by the side of the most sensitive and inventive of Frenchmen and Russians.—Daily Mail.

Arnold Schönberg, as he reveals himself in these pieces, will only be comprehended by a generation which has completely revised the modern conception of music. Yet it is impossible to doubt that his aims, however obscure, are perfectly serious.—Sunday Times.

After the experience of the early works of Arnold Schönberg we are fully entitled to question the sincerity of his recent offerings to musical literature, although they have certainly brought him notoriety.—Observer.

This pleasure is mixed with pain. Schönberg is undoubtedly sincere, while his sincerity is open to question. In the face of general testimony to the 'reticence' of his 'quiet and subdued' writing, we read that:

Schönberg's music, with its aimless shrieks, squeals, bangs, and blares, is madness. Moreover, a burlesque would be very easy, and just as effective.—Daily Graphic.

In answer to the latter dictum, we are told by the Westminster Gazette that . . . it would be quite impossible to burlesque this music, for the wildest imaginable parody could not conceivably surpass the original in its seeming formlessness, harmonic anarchy, and general unintelligibility.

The same paper also refers to the 'beautiful delicacy and subtlety of the orchestral colouring.'

A pleasing outcome of Herr Schönberg's visit was a public letter to the Queen's Hall Orchestra, in which he expressed his high appreciation of the ensemble, precision, beauty of sound, and thoroughness of the playing. He said that only the Amsterdam Orchestra and the Viennese Philharmonic could compare with the Queen's Hall Orchestra, and added that it was a great pleasure to be confirmed in his opinion that the last technical acquirements of instrumental playing could be made use of in the full orchestra.

What are the true criteria of a nation's musical standing? We are all familiar with the writers of articles or letters who deny us all claim to musical self-respect. Their strongest argument is the popularity of bad music, a fault which we seem to share in equal degree with France and America at least. Are we to judge from the nature of our native-made music, the average standard of soloists, the state of public appreciation and criticism, the prosperity and vitality of our academies, the position of music in schools (where audiences of the next generation are made)? In every instance we take a high place, and in at least two we take the first. As regards public taste, one point is generally omitted by our apologists. A modern work, after prolonged popularity on the Continent and frequent mention in the 'Foreign notes' column of the Musical Times, is ultimately heard in England. What, in frequent cases, is the result? Its obvious pretentiousness and emptiness are immediately perceived by Press and public alike, and the work is dropped for good.

The immediate provocation of this homily was not mentioned therein. It was the perusal of the advertisement pages of the Referee, affording a bird's-eye view of the extraordinary multiplicity of concerts, orchestral and otherwise, that take place in London on Sundays. No other city can show a parallel quantity, not even the Continental places where the chief concerts of the week take place on Sundays. On Sunday, November 30, 1913, there were given no less than five orchestral concerts (at the Albert Hall, Queen's Hall, Palladium, London Opera House, and Alhambra), and two miscellaneous concerts (at the Queen's Hall and Palladium). On December 7 the list was precisely similar. On December 14 there were again seven concerts, but only four were orchestral. We must not forget, moreover, the 'South Place Sunday Popular Concerts,' which, although so styled, are in reality chamber-music of the highest type by the best artists. The range of the orchestral concerts we have referred to is from Beethoven, Brahms, and Wagner down to, say, Hérold's 'Zampa' and the like, with a distinct leaning towards the better end of it. The full realisation of the extent and nature of all this musical activity gave a decided fillip to our patriotic optimism.

The year's great deep thought! Our esteemed contemporary, The Organist and Choirmaster, says of 1914:

Certain things are bound to happen; many more things may happen; it is impossible to say this or that may not happen!

We can only add that certainly uncertain things will happen!

THE MUSIC OF THE ANCIENTS.

(RÉSUMÉ OF FOUR LECTURES DELIVERED AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.)

BY KATHLEEN SCHLESINGER.

There is probably in the whole history of the Arts no such debatable proposition as the one arising out of the music of the Ancients. Did they practise harmony in our sense of the word? Or was this development, which forms the basis of our Western musical system, unknown to them even in its most elementary stages? Writers on music of all nations have been engaged in this controversy for the past three hundred years, more especially as it concerns classic Greece. Distinguished writers and classical scholars of our day, such as Gevaert, Riemann, Louis Laloy, Maurice Emmanuel, Macran, Munro, and, quite recently, Mr. J. Curtis,* have sought to unravel the mysteries of the Greek musical system. Even they are not agreed in deciphering and translating into modern equivalents or approximates the musical notation of the ancient Greeks. The precise nature of the Greek modes, Dorian, Phrygian, and Lydian; the values of the three principal genera of scales—diatonic, chromatic, and enharmonic—have not yet been determined on a generally accepted basis.

What is at the root of the mystery that eludes all the culture and science of our age? There are a very few precious relics of Greek music in notation, the most ancient of which is attributed to the 3rd century B.C. A few learned treatises on music by philosophers and mathematicians, such as Aristoxenus, Aristotle, Aristides Quintillianus, Euclid, Ptolemy, &c., are extant; passages relating to music abound in the classics. A few musical instruments, chiefly pipes, have survived, and are preserved in our museums; the proportions of these, the diameters of the holes and their respective distances along the bore of the pipes, afford certain indications; the stringed instruments unfortunately remain mute.

Investigations are proceeding, but no definite conclusions have been reached, and no reasonable working hypothesis has yet been offered.

Though fully conscious of deficiencies in scholarly equipment, the writer has recently introduced, in a series of lectures at the British Museum, her conception of the character of Music among the Ancients. This conception has been gained after long years of archaeological study and research, and through intuitive rather than logical and rational deductions, but the basic laws upon which it rests find confirmation in the philosophical and esoteric writings of the East; and music evolves from this basis naturally and in complete accordance with what is known of the early religions, rituals, and magic of the Ancient East, as also with such allusions to Music as we find scattered through the Old Testament.

In those early days music had not yet become an art.

Sound, it is well known, is merely the name given to certain vibrations which the ear is capable of registering. If those vibrations are irregular or non-rational the result is noise, but when the vibrations occur periodically, the result is recognised by the ear as pleasant, and we call the result 'a musical sound.' The important factor in the physical basis of music is ratio.

It is generally known that all rich musical sounds are of a compound nature; following the Germans, we call these sounds clangs. They consist of a predominating, fundamental, or root note accompanied by a number of simple sounds of different pitch standing to one another in the relation of simple aliquot ratios, that is to say, they are all members of the natural harmonic series, and are due to sectional molecular vibration. These harmonic overtones or upper-partials constitute the physical basis of music. The fundamental or primary note is the one which leaves upon the ear the impression of definite pitch, while the harmonics which develop as a kind of arpeggio above it, are synthesised by the ear, and losing their individuality as notes of definite pitch, they produce the psychological effect known as timbre or tone-quality. So completely have these numerical values of the concomitant sounds lost their appeal to the ear, that even the most sensitive ear of the musician, unaided by resonators or other scientific devices, fails to detect more than the first five or six of the series, when notes are played or sung in succession. When listening to these harmonics developed from a bass note played and held down on the pianoforte, with the strings uncovered and the dampers raised, we find that they not only differ in pitch, but that they vary also in cyclic intensity and changing rhythms. In fact they form a natural tone-picture. Moreover these concomitant harmonics differ entirely from the fundamental in tone-quality—they are like ghosts of the independent harmonics that violinists, for instance, produce by well-known means; they not only sound once, like the fundamental in one continuous note which dies away gradually, but are repeated many times.

Many people are entirely unconscious of the ear's power of synthesis, which varies greatly in individuals, and is a comparatively recent acquisition in the history of man.

* Journal of Hellenic Studies, Sept., 1913. 'Greek Music.'

The writer's conception of the music of the Ancients, in the early days when their primitive instruments had a range of three or four notes only, or even perhaps of seven, is that they heard, all unconscious of their significance, these natural harmonics as an accompaniment to the note they played or sang. That they heard these far more clearly and definitely than we do was due to the fact that their ears had not yet learned to synthesise the natural harmonics, transmuting quantity into quality. Thus, during the age of simplicity, the Ancients were content to sing or play one note and to listen to Nature's tone-picture, as the arpeggio chords on disintegrating led up by a single note to the next chord.

Have we any proof that what science now denominates simple sounds (such as harmonics) are not in themselves aggregates of sounds or vibrations, still finer, but too delicate to be perceived by our ears in their present state of development?

Let us posit that this conception of the music of the Ancients is the right one. What then?

We find ourselves at a time when the art of music was as yet unborn; nevertheless, here was music of great beauty and potency, demanding no skill on the part of the performer. The harmonic overtones, being the result of a natural law, were not determined by man's will, nor were they produced directly through his agency by visible or obvious mechanical means. All this world of beauty sprang into being when initiated by man, but he had no hand in painting the picture, he could not consciously control or modify the colours. By observation he learnt in time to combine voices and instruments in order to enlarge and vary the sounds he heard. These ghost-tones of ethereal beauty, with their rhythms and varying intensities, being beyond man's control, were invested with a certain mystery. Divine origin and power were attributed to them. These overtones may have produced an effect on the soul or spirit of man without first playing on the emotions and intellect as music does at the present day. This would explain Plato's views on the ideal music for his Utopia. Does not this conception explain why innumerable myths sprang up in all lands, ascribing the invention of music and musical instruments to one or other of the gods, and why music formed part of the earliest known rituals in the temples, as for instance, in ancient Chaldea—some 2,500 or more years before our era? This theory would explain the concerts of instruments grouped together by the Ancients without the necessity of crediting them with the knowledge of some form of harmony (since those instruments could not all have played in unison or even in octaves).

What we call timbre is then merely the cumulative result of a clang comprising a natural aggregate, characteristic for each voice or instrument, of harmonics within the natural order of the series, in varying intensities and rhythms. Various instruments, whether playing in unison or in polyphony, would at first be used merely for the purpose of varying Nature's music.

It will be seen that this conception of music, while providing for music of subtle beauty, does not attribute to man technical skill, artistic imagination, or the possession of any musical system of scales or modes; and yet it explains the birth of melody, and the gradual development or unfolding of harmony by the unconscious translation of latent harmonics from the realm of the subconscious into that of concrete sound.

Let us now seek confirmation of this new and perhaps debatable theory in the Bible, where the relationship which music bore to life and religion is at once apparent. Music occupies a very exalted position, and we find a potency ascribed to it that would be quite incomprehensible on any other basis.

The prophets of the Old Testament required music to call down upon them the Spirit of the Lord that they might prophesy. For instance, in II. Kings iii. 15, Elisha said:

But now bring me a minstrel. And it came to pass, when the minstrel played, that the hand of the Lord came upon him.

And then Elisha gave forth words of wisdom. In the account of the anointing of Saul by Samuel, I. Sam. x., Samuel said to Saul (vv. 5, 6, 10):

... And it shall come to pass, when thou art come thither to the city, that thou shalt meet a company of prophets coming down from the high place with a psaltery, and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp, before them; and they shall prophesy. And the Spirit of the Lord will come upon thee, and thou shalt prophesy with them, and shalt be turned into another man.

—And when they came thither to the hill, behold, a company of prophets met him; and the Spirit of God came upon him, and he prophesied among them.

In the former case, we may conclude from the very bald statement of facts that the occurrence was not an unusual one, for it evoked no wonder or comment. No special qualification was required of the minstrel: 'Bring me a minstrel,' said Elisha; no qualification of the music, no excellence or beauty, no special chant composed for such occasions, 'when the minstrel played.'

Nevertheless the music had a potency beyond all human potencies. It was not the human factor, the high standard of the art, which placed the prophet in communication with the Divine Spirit, nor is there any hint of inspiration on the part of the minstrel. All that was required was the proper attitude of spirit on the part of the prophet: what the French express so well by recueillement.

On another occasion, when the Ark was brought back with great rejoicings and placed in the Temple newly built and dedicated by Solomon, we read in II. Chronicles v. that when the 120 trumpeters and singers were at one to make one sound, that the glory of the Lord in the form of a cloud filled the Temple.

Once again it was not the art of the musician or of the composition that constituted the potency, but the vast body of sound, at one or in unison, producing the harmonics of the series from one fundamental in immense volume. Imagine the high harmonics which constitute the timbre of the trumpet—from the sixteenth to the sixty-fourth, and probably higher still—reinforced by 120 trumpets, and borne aloft on the diaphanous quality of the men's voices. There is in Plato's dialogue, 'Timæus' (p. 80), a passage which indicates that philosophers were beginning to speculate on the nature of the harmonics, and on the composition of musical sounds. He describes the interplay of the harmonics and of the fundamental, the struggle for supremacy, and the delight arising from the single mixed expression of high and low.

MUSIC AND MAGIC.

The connection between music and magic in Antiquity affords further corroboration of this new theory to those who can accept provisionally as Truth what was Truth to the Ancients.

The earliest meaning of the word 'magic' was 'wisdom,' a branch of occult philosophy embracing the knowledge of the hidden laws of nature and of the mysterious forces of life.

The 'Magus,' Philosopher or Initiate, could only attain to this wisdom by a supreme and sustained effort of the will by control of the senses, high thinking, meditation, devotion, love of the whole created universe, and the abnegation of self. The use of this knowledge for the control of those forces of nature and of life constituted practical magic. As long as the 'Magus' used his knowledge for beneficent purposes, for the alleviation of suffering, and for the guidance of humanity, he was a high-priest and white magician. As in every other branch of human knowledge, this wisdom brought with it great temptations, self-interest, high places, riches, honours, the favour of kings, which led to a debasement of the high wisdom, sometimes known as grey magic—while the deliberate use of high powers to work evil constituted black magic. Under the term magician, applied to one who practised materialised magic, were included astrologers, soothsayers, diviners.

In Chaldea, for instance, in the early days of Sumer and Akkad, we find a priest known as the Psalmist in charge of the Temple services, which were named after the instruments used: Service for the flute, Service for the lyre, &c. The ritual of practical magic, on the other hand, was administered by a priest in huts in the field, and was of a private nature.

Much interesting matter bearing on this point is to be found in translations of the cuneiform inscriptions. The scope of this article does not admit of quotation. The important factors in music, considered in its relation to magic, which are emphasised in all the ancient religions and philosophies of the East, are the human voice, sound, as a potency, and numbers. These three seem to constitute the key to magic.

The Logos or word as instrument of creation is found in almost all the ancient religions. Among the Chaldeans, Bel or Merodach was called the Word of the Firmament. In Egypt Thoth, who devised the alphabet, and gave mathematics and literature to man, created the universe by his omnipotent word.

Hermes was identified with the Logos. All are familiar with the beginning of the Gospel of St. John. The word Logos may mean embodied idea, plan, word of command, reason, sound, ratio or proportion. The last two, sound and ratio, are those connected with magic and music. Pythagoras declared that numbers formed the most potent factor in the creation of the manifested universe, and this idea runs through all the esoteric writings of the East. An incantation culled from a collection of metrical proverbs and old popular Accadian songs, which was intended to influence the growth of the crops, shows that a belief in the potency of numbers was current amongst the people. 'The corn which stands upright shall come to the end of its prosperous growth. The number [to produce that] we know it.'

Lenormant, in his 'History of Chaldean Magic,' states that still more powerful than the incantations were conjurations wrought by the power of numbers, and that in this way the supreme secret Hea taught to his son Silik-mulu-Khi, when consulted by him in his distress, was always called 'the number.'

To return to the Bible, we find there a verse which refers to this secret knowledge of numbers, in Ecclesiastes vii. 25 :

I applied mine heart to know, and to search, and to seek out wisdom and the reason of things.

This verse (in the Vulgate (ut) quaererem sapientiam et rationem) is thus given by St. Augustine in his treatise 'De Musica,' iv., cap. iv. :

I have turned in all directions in order to understand, and beholding, to recognise and to seek out wisdom and the science of numbers.

What is the mysterious and potent force of numbers? We have seen that timbre or tone-quality is a matter of ratio, as indeed is all sound ; vowels and consonants are also numbers or ratios in selection.

Substances also have their numbers, and have resonance ; chemical formulæ are a proof of this, while indicating the composition of the substance. So many molecules of this element, so many of that, and of a third and fourth, combine to form a compound. The molecule is composed of atoms innumerable, and the atom of ions, positive and negative, in varying combinations. All substances are thus a matter of ratio.

If, therefore, you possessed this occult wisdom, this knowledge of the hidden forces of Nature and of Life, and of the relations of numbers or harmony, you would know first of all the proportions or numbers of all created objects and substances, bodies, and living beings ; the number, in fact, which is the factor of cohesion. Upset the proportion, and the substance disintegrates, a lesson we learn from chemistry. It is number or ratio which is the sole agent of differentiation. It is harmony—Music.

Finally, let us recall the incidents of the fall of the walls of Jericho : The seven priests bearing seven trumpets compassed the city seven times on the seventh day—and the priests blew a long blast with the rams' horns, then the people shouted with a great shout, and the walls of the city fell.

Here the exoteric teaching would appear to emphasise the number seven ; but it was the shout in unison, with the note of the rams' horns as a fundamental, accompanied by the great body of harmonics, that furnished the secret ratio which destroyed the cohesion of the walls.

Church and Organ Music.

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

BY HARVEY GRACE.

A correspondent asks for advice on teaching boys to read from the staff. As a rule, the reading of choirboys is a matter of ear, sharpness, luck, and imitative faculty. The choirmaster with poorish material and few practices almost invariably leaves it to these agencies, and on the whole boys have a surprising knack of learning new music by these haphazard methods. There is not much inducement for the busy organist systematically to teach his boys to read. He might cheerfully undertake it for a few months if the results were likely to be more than fleeting. But he knows too well that the following year will see him with a large proportion of new boys, and so the regular reading-lesson goes to the wall. Where the time can be spared, it will however be well spent. The teaching of the staff ab initio depends so much upon the careful grading of the lessons, that it is quite impossible to deal with it in a single paper. Those who wish to set about it will find the subject exhaustively dealt with in Dr. McNaught's 'The school sight-singing reader,' published in two sixpenny parts, or one shilling complete (Novello). Armed with this, a blackboard, and due pains, one may safely embark on a project that will certainly repay the trouble in cases where a great deal of difficult music has to be got through.

The choirmaster should be able, at the end of the term, to conjure up a mental picture of each boy's work during that term. From the maximum amount due, deduct a sum in accordance with this picture. Payment on the basis of so much per practice and service might easily result in a useless boy getting more than a useful one.

Don't keep old boys too long. The characteristic charm of a boy's voice is its youthfulness and freshness. A few adolescent hooters will spoil the effect of the whole choir. It is hard to part with boys who know the whole repertory, but in the long run it pays to give their places to promising juniors. Don't expect old heads on young shoulders, and don't forget what a terror you were in your own choirboy days.

Don't bear grudges. A practice should be started with a clean slate all round. Don't allow sulking; it is the unforgivable sin in a choirboy. A hopeless sulker should be got rid of, even if he have the voice of a nightingale. He is likely to infect others with his sulkiness, and the odds are that when you want his voice it will not be forthcoming. Besides, sulkiness leaves the choirmaster helpless, and it is not good that his choir should see him nonplussed.

It might well happen, that given the conditions under which so many organists have to work—handicapped by indifferent material and poor financial support—the part of his task requiring most thought and care will be less on the musical than on the social side. We say commonly that 'money talks.' In choir matters we might almost say that 'money sings.' At all events, by means of it one may gather round one the people most likely to sing. Whether they will do so, or whether they will proceed to yell, howl, scream, or relapse into a state of devout torpor, must in the event depend upon the teacher. While the power of money is therefore less actual than potential, there can be no question about the increased arduousness of choir-training when the teacher is able to offer only the slenderest inducements in the matter of pay. With the increase of cheap amusements, the growing dislike of restraint, and the many ways in which a sharp boy can earn money, choir-work has to be made attractive if a steady supply of boys is to be forthcoming. For this reason, the discipline of such a choir as we are considering is a thing by itself. Indeed, perhaps discipline is hardly the word for the case. It suggests too drastic methods. A boy is bound to go to school, and to be well-behaved in class, and compelled to do his lessons, and his parents are responsible for his doing so. But he is not bound to join a choir, and in many cases his parents are not anxious that he should. The choirmaster has no cane in the background, no impositions wherewith to punish defaulters, no attendance officer behind him with the powers of the law to invoke in extreme cases. Even in the rare event of parents compelling a boy to join a choir, he cannot be made to sing if he chooses not to, any more than a horse can be made to drink, though he may easily be led to the water. There remains for punishment nothing but the fine. But if fines are frequent and the pay small, a boy may easily on pay-day owe the choirmaster a small sum instead of receiving one, which is absurd. Besides which, a fine threatened early in the quarter is the merest shadow of a penalty. Even adults are not greatly impressed by the prospect of a calamity in the remote future. The boy is father to the man, and next pay-day a long way off; so that, on the whole, fining is a poor aid to discipline. In excess, too, it is a confession of weakness on the choirmaster's part, just as a too liberal use of corporal punishment in a school points to deficiencies elsewhere than among the taught.

Thus, more perhaps than any other member of the teaching profession, the choirmaster is thrown back on himself. His tact, good humour, common-sense, power of interesting—in a word, his personality—must serve as attendance officer, impositions, and cane. And after all, for this particular kind of work, there can be no better monitors. You may compel a boy at the point of the birch to do a sum correctly, even while in his heart are black mutiny and loathing for his task. You cannot make him sing well unless he is enjoying himself in the process. Good choir-training therefore (as we are assured is the case with animal training) is 'all done by kindness'—which by no means implies weakness.

There are many people who regard the choir-boy either as an angel or a young fiend. The more impressionable among the female part of the congregation of course imagine him as the former. In the eyes of most laymen (and even of some clergy and choirmasters) he is regarded as the latter; whereas he is an ordinary boy, with perhaps a dash of the angel showing itself at times and certainly a fair supply of the other extreme. Probably most choirmasters will subscribe to the opinion that the very good boy is of little use for any but spectacular purposes. Nothing shows our altered attitude towards him more than the vogue and decline of Sullivan's song 'The Chorister.' A copy lies before me now, the cover with the picture of a youth (apparently of somewhat ripe age for a treble) with long black hair, taper fingers clasping a book to his abdomen, and clad in a surplice of a cut surely unique. The effect is heightened by a background of pale blue fading into rose-pink.

Is this song ever sung now? Corney Grain's skit, 'The polka and the choirboy,' had much to do with its decline in favour. Just as 'The Chorister' asserted himself—we are told that when the anthem was 'upward pealing'

One sweet voice above the rest
I heard so sweetly ringing—even so did his brother of the parody :

And when he sang in choruses
His voice o'ertopped the rest,
Which was very inartistic,
But the public liked that best.

Both boys met with the same premature fate. Of the first, we learn (with the aid of triplet chords and harmonium) in verse three, that :

He sings among the angels now
Beside the crystal river—

while as for Corney Grain's hero :

Of course he soon grew pale and thin,
And faded day by day
Until—about the third verse—
He faded quite away.

(Is there, by-the-by, a 'semi-sacred' song in which the doomed child ever survives that fatal third verse? This dreadful crisis tided over—the child snatched indoors from the blinding snowstorm, removed from its slumber in the abbey porch, or the mysterious ailment treated in time, and the rubicon safely crossed to a fourth verse—he or she might grow to a green, old age.)

The choirboy, then, is best treated when it is borne in mind that he is just a normal boy. The choirmaster who, whatever his age, is still at heart near his own youth, will best distinguish in matters of conduct between what is bad and what is merely boyish. Pet a chorister, and he becomes an insufferable little prig. Bully or nag at him, and his place knows him no more. Treat him with the fairness that you would ask for yourself, plus a slight leaning on the side of leniency, and a knowledge of the right time to turn the blind eye and the deaf ear, and you will find him the jolliest and most willing of colleagues.

Finally, when will the importance of the choir-master, as a factor in the musical future of our country, be more fully recognised? At present his work, like that of the elementary school-teacher, is under-rated. It is no small matter for a man, in the course of a professional life of normal length, to be practically the sole musical influence over hundreds of boys during the most impressionable time of their lives. It is not easy to keep undimmed the ideals with which he began his work in the glamour of a first appointment. He will be helped if he remembers that, week in, week out, his boys are unconsciously learning from him as to whether the best or the worst is good enough. He will have discouragements in plenty, and not too much appreciation. Sometimes he will see the result in the person of one of his old boys, now a choir-master himself, filled with the enthusiasm and ambition of his early teacher, and his disappointments will be forgotten in the realisation that here, and perhaps in other cases lost to sight, he had builded better than he knew.

We have received the following letter:

DEAR SIR,—The article of the 'Compleat Organist' in your December issue is very interesting, and contains some good things; it is pleasant also to find him so sportive with his pastors and masters, though I think his particular gentleman of the cloth is stuffed with straw, and is demolished too easily. As one who thinks he is not yet quite done with, and who reads a musical journal, will you allow me space for a mild counterblast.

The assumption that the clergy will do well to stick to their pulpits while the organist reigns supreme, over the choir at least, from the music-stool cannot be conceded. The pastor is the responsible man for the offering of true worship in his church. He cannot evade it or depute it; he is called to lead. If the organist will thoroughly back him up in this aim and endeavour, and will care for the spiritual as well as for the musical tone of the choir, happy is the pastor, and happy may they all be. In these days of powerful organs and large choirs there are great abilities to help, or to hinder, in the organist and choir. Then as to the congregation, they are fellow-worshippers; and a few words which Cardinal Manning once said about sermons may well be remembered in connection with their needs. 'Preaching,' he said, 'is like playing dominoes. You have not only to consider what you can put down, but what the other man can put down also.' This is verbum sapienti, a word to a wise organist.

When next I have to do with appointing an organist, I should like to ask the selected candidates to submit to these three tests, of which they might have notice:

1. Interpret and illustrate two Psalms on the organ, let us say 24 or 29 and 57. Interpret also the 'Te Deum' as the climax of praise in the morning service.
2. Take the junior or probationer choir-boys, and give them a simple lesson in voice-production. Then take a hymn (let us say 161 A. & M.), and present it, and extemporise for a few minutes after the Amen. Transpose another hymn. Play one of your own choice.
3. Play a piece for execution. Bach's Fugue in G minor, if you like. (But if so, I must send for another blower.)

And now a last word about mission hymns. Has the 'Compleat Organist' much experience of these hymns in action? For some people, and on some occasions, if we do not use such hymns and tunes as are provided in the Mirfield Mission Hymn Book, I think we neglect an asset of great value. We suffer from formalism, and need fervour. The tune which the 'Compleat Organist' quotes does need the hand of a musical editor, or shall we say, of a proof-corrector; but plain errors may often be corrected at practices, with good effect, or even in the course of playing. I would not put in mission tunes too often. They do not compare, in other points besides technical correctness, with Dr. Croft's 'Hanover,' or Dr. Dykes's setting of 'Behold the Lamb of God,' or many another in our greater hymn-books. But I think Dr. Hopkins's 'Ellers' (which is in the Mirfield book, but not in A. & M.) one of the finest tunes ever written, and I would not be without the tune to 'Jesus, my Lord, my God, my all' in that book, both of which have a rare devotional quality; and that is what we want.—Yours very truly, T. H. PARKER.

Stratford-on-Avon.

MR. HARVEY GRACE replies as follows:

The pastor is the responsible man for the offering of true-worship in his church.' Agreed. He will best fulfil his responsibility by engaging a thoroughly competent organist and choir-master, and letting him do the work. He may well lay down, for the organist's guidance, general directions as to the style of service he wishes to be adopted, but in the detailed carrying out of these plans he must be prepared to give the organist credit for knowing best how to go to work. Mr. Parker's proposed tests for an applicant applying for the organistship at his church err, if at all, on the side of modesty, though much depends upon which of Bach's Fugues in G minor is meant. The 'spiritual tone' of the choir is a matter for the pastor. The choir are merely members of the congregation told off for special church work, as are sidesmen, district visitors, and the like. Any organist worthy of his calling, however, will take care that the pastor's efforts for the spiritual welfare of the choir are aided by his discipline and personal example. In return, the 'complete pastor' will strengthen the organist's hands by backing him up in his work, and refraining from interference in matters concerning which the organist is a trained man and he himself an amateur.

Mr. Parker's plea for shoddy hymn-tunes would have more weight if he would take his courage in both hands and advocate similar vulgarities in other accessories of public worship. We musicians naturally object to our particular art being singled out for debasement.

There are, of course, a few clergy who are skilled musicians, just as there are probably a few organists who are no mean theologians. But both are exceptions, and to the average member of both professions may be quoted the proverb of the shoemaker and his last. I thank Mr. Parker for his kindly tone, and assure him that the article was an attempt to be fair to both sides. In order to remove a false impression, I may assure him that my own personal relations with the clergy have always been of the happiest. But I have known many cases of the reverse, and these, and what appeared to me to be their causes and remedies, were in my mind when I wrote.

DR. ALCOCK'S NEW BOOK ON ORGAN TECHNIQUE.*

From the ancient monk, smiting with clenched fist the broad, clumsy keys of the organ of his time (beating out the crude attempts at two-part harmony that contemporary purists no doubt anathematised as decadent and futurist) to the modern organist is a far cry. Probably no musical instrument can show so long a road between its embryonic and its finished forms as the organ. 'Finished,' did we say! Will there ever be an organ to which one can point as being the final form of the instrument? There is only one pianoforte and only one violin, but there are, and will be, a thousand organs.

Every new feat of the organ-builder involves some modification or development of the organist's technique. The fundamentals of organ-playing remain, but an organist of to-day—even one young enough to shy at the word 'middle-aged'—has added and subtracted a great deal in matters of technical detail since his student days.

* 'The Organ.' By W. G. Alcock, M.V.O., Mus. Doc. (Novello, London.)

Therefore, while a new book of instruction for the violin, pianoforte, or the voice, or indeed, almost any instrument, is put forth more or less apologetically, a similar work on organ-playing is from time to time a necessity. The latest of these, in Dr. Alcock's 'The Organ,' lies before us. The work is divided into ten sections:

- I. Pipes, manuals, couplers, &c.
- II. Pedal exercises.
- III. Manual touch, harmony and expression.
- IV. Left hand and pedals.
- V. Exercises on crossing the hands.
- VI. Three-part studies.
- VII. On the playing of hymn tunes.
- VIII. Exercises in four parts.
- IX. Six short pieces on various technical points:
 - Repeated notes; staccato pedals combined with legato manuals; legato pedals combined with staccato manual chords; breadth of style; thumbs on a separate manual; dotted notes.
- X. Exercises on the use of the swell pedal.

In Section I., the '&c.' comprises valuable hints on registration and the use of the swell pedal. In the matter of couplers, we are glad to see Dr. Alcock's protest against the too liberal use of the 'Swell to Great.' He points out that 'the uncoupled Great is capable of fine and characteristic effects when heard alone, and such use of it should be encouraged.' The reluctance so to use it is one of the results of the influence of orchestral music on modern taste. The average listener describes as cold and soulless any strains that are not more or less in a state of surge. As a matter of fact, too, the organ is the only instrument that is able to give us an absolutely unvarying degree of power for any length of time. The more frequent use of Choir and Great uncoupled will enormously increase the effectiveness of the Swell.

In Section III. we note as being of special value Exercises 47 and 48, dealing with the crossing of parts, and transference of a middle voice from hand to hand. Perhaps they might with advantage have been preceded by one or two simpler examples. One of the most troublesome stages in learning the organ is the overcoming of the reluctance of the left hand and feet to move in contrary motion. Exercises 50 to 56 (which of course may usefully be taken with right hand and pedals) are well designed for the meeting of this difficulty. They are followed by exercises for pedals alone, including double pedalling, the major and minor scales in all keys, the chromatic scale, arpeggio studies, and exercises for loosening the ankles.

Every teacher knows the difficulty pupils have in playing a left-hand accompaniment involving the use of two staves. Exercises 124, 125, and 126 are very helpful on this point, as also are the short supplementary studies that follow.

The pupil is brought a stage nearer to Trio-playing in Section V., in which manual crossing of parts is dealt with in some well-written two-voice studies. The Trios that follow are well-graded, and are of far greater musical interest than such things are wont to be. The last one, for example, is an admirable organ-piece of three pages in length. No better preparation for hymn-playing can be found than in the study of the Bach harmonizations of Chorales, and Dr. Alcock has done well in making Section VII. consist of nothing else. The six pieces in Section IX.

are not only useful studies, but effective little pieces as well.

No organist need disdain as short voluntaries, Nos. 169, 171, 172, 174 and 175, for instance. Section X. contains four studies on the use of the swell pedal. The balanced form has so frequently to be manipulated by the left foot while the right is pedalling, that Dr. Alcock has done well in devoting two of the exercises to this point. The work closes with six pieces in different styles, designed with a view to gathering up the technical points just dealt with. They comprise a Voluntary, Impromptu, Legend, Fantasia, Toccata, and Introduction and Fughetta. The author modestly disclaims for them either merit or originality, but as a matter of fact they contain much of the former, and in the Legend and Toccata (an admirable staccato study) a good deal of the latter. In the Toccata, by-the-by, the whole-tone scale makes several appearances—surely the first time that fashionable progression has made its bow in an instruction book, though it has long been an habitué of the organ key-board at the hands of the tuner.

Apart from the excellence of this book on the technical side, Dr. Alcock is to be commended for making it of so much interest musically. His studies are, of course, invariably well written, but so also were those of the industrious Rinck, Schneider, and others to whom some of us devoted ourselves in our pupillage. Compared with those soulless abstractions, Dr. Alcock's studies are as the 'primrose path of dalliance,' and the pupil who is bored with them has certainly taken up the organ by mistake. It should be added that the section of the book dealing with the mechanical side of the instrument is illustrated by some excellent photographs by Mr. J. J. Walker.

On January 17 Mr. Herbert L. Ellingsford (organist, St. George's Hall, Liverpool) began the second year of his engagement under the Corporation. Since January 18, 1913, he has played before seventy thousand people; and has given recitals in some of the important cities of Great Britain and Ireland. At St. George's Hall, Liverpool, he has given 350 items (counting a complete suite, sonata, or a group of pieces as one item only) without repetition. These were selected from the original or transcribed works of British, American, Belgian, Bohemian, Finnish, French, German, Hungarian, Italian, Norwegian, Russian, and Spanish composers. His programmes have included the greatest organ works of J. S. Bach; orchestral overtures of Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn, Brahms, and Wagner (from his own transcriptions), and many new works by living composers.

Mr. Reginald Goss-Custard has resigned the post of organist and choirmaster at St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, which he has held since 1902, and will in future devote his time to solo organ-playing and teaching. He has already earned wide popularity as a recital organist. It will be welcome news to many that he will continue to give his Saturday recitals at St. Margaret's during the winter months. Mr. Goss-Custard's portrait and a few facts of his career were given in our issue for August, 1905, in connection with an illustrated article on St. Margaret's Church. His successor is Mr. Edwin Stephenson.

The Incorporated Guild of Church Musicians held its twenty-sixth annual banquet at the Holborn Restaurant on January 19. The vice-president, Mr. George R. Jellicoe, was in the chair. In proposing the toast of the Guild he announced that the silver medal had been awarded to Mr. G. H. Freeth for a Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F, bronze medals to Dr. Joseph Summers for a Vesper Hymn, and to Mr. Arthur Brown for a 'changeable chant.' The chief topic discussed by after-dinner speakers, among whom were Dr. J. H. Lewis and Dr. Churchill Sibley, was that of the registration of teachers and the exclusion of the Guild from representation on the Teachers' Registration Council.

The annual service of the National Welsh Festival will be held at St. Paul's Cathedral on February 26. Singers are invited to join the choir, which meets for rehearsal at St. Benet's Welsh Church, Queen Victoria Street, on Thursdays. The accompaniment will be supplied by the Band of His Majesty's Grenadier Guards, under Lieut. A. Williams, and at the organ by Mr. R. Meyrick Roberts and Mr. David J. Thomas.

Sir J. D. McClure, Mus.D., LL.D., has assumed the presidency of the Free Church Musicians' Union, and will deliver his presidential address at the annual meeting to be held in London next April.

On Sunday, December 14, Maunders' Cantata, 'Bethlehem,' was given in the Baptist Chapel, Quorn, before a large congregation. The soloists were Miss Justina Keightley, Messrs. J. Lacey, A. Freer, and T. Patrick. Mr. H. H. North was at the organ.

During the Christmas season 'The Messiah' was given in countless Churches throughout the country, and a number of notices, programmes, &c., have been sent to us for the purpose of registering the performances in these columns. While thanking our correspondents for the information they have provided, we regret that considerations of space preclude our making use of it, and consider it would be invidious to make a selection.

Julius Harrison's melodious and pleasing 'Christmas cantata' was performed on December 28 at the Congregational Church, Church End, Finchley, under the direction of Mr. Frederick Meen. The solo parts were taken by Miss Annie Peck, Miss Dora Jenkins, Mr. Percy Deakin, and Mr. F. S. Wilcock.

John E. West's 'Story of Bethlehem' was given by the choir of South Hackney Parish Church at Evensong on Sunday, December 28, and again on January 4. The solo parts on each occasion were taken by Master M. Spotswood and Messrs. W. Taylor, Chippendale, Dean, N. Copcutt, and F. Sparrow. Mr. C. H. Lawrence presided at the organ, and Mr. R. Bernard Elliott, the organist of the Church, conducted. The work, which has been given annually at this Church since 1908, was much appreciated by the congregation.

Lectures on the 'Six Organ sonatas of Bach' were given by Dr. H. W. Richards at the Duke's Hall, Royal Academy of Music, on January 14 and 21.

A special service of praise was held in Dunkeld Cathedral on Sunday, January 18, at which Thomas Adams's Cantata, 'The Holy Child,' was sung by the choir, assisted by Mrs. S. H. Cooke and Mr. T. Menzies. Mr. Sydney Herbert Cooke (choirmaster of the Cathedral) presided at the organ.

CHORAL MUSIC.

- The wake of O'Connor*. Cantata. Words by R. Buchanan. Music by Hubert Bath.
Fisher-folk Lullaby. Part-song. Words and music by Harvey Grace.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Hubert Bath is one of the few who perceive and profit by the advice often given to our young and over-serious composers desipere in loco, and the sweets he tastes are those of popularity. Not that in forgetting his seriousness he forgets to be an artist. He can at one and the same time appeal to the crowd with his light-hearted geniality and to the musician with his craft. 'The wake of O'Connor' is one of the best examples of the kind that he has given us. Its music reflects faithfully the spirit of Robert Buchanan's poem, which shows the engaging Irish nature, pathetically smiling in the face of tragedy. For 'The wake of O'Connor' is a tragedy, in which the hero dies before the curtain goes up. There is no plot. We are shown a company of Irish peasantry keeping watch over their defunct friend and fiddler, 'stretch'd out at his ease . . . holding his fiddle and stick and drest top to toe in his Sunday best.' The motto of it all is:

'Sure life's like his music and ended soon—

There's dancing and crying,
There's kissing, there's sighing,
There's smiling and sporting,
There's wedding and courting,—

But the skirl of the wake is the end of the tune !'

One after another, Judy O'Roon, Kitty O'Bride, Tim Blane, Rose Donnell, Pat Rooney, Shamus the Fool, and Barnaby Blake have their say, and so the night passes.

Mr. Bath's music mingles fun and pathos, with a strong Irish accent. It is full of variety, and at the same time consistent and appropriate. What is equally important—it is practical. The voice parts are such as voices can sing. Four soloists are required, and each has something individual to contribute. After Rose Donnell has played the drumindhu, the soprano introduces a passage of captivating melody on the words, 'Oh, 'twas sweet as the crooning of fairies by night.' All the soloists join in, and a dainty undertone is sounded by the choir. This is a 'number' that is sure to make good with audiences. Presently, to the accompaniment of a lively jig, the tenor, as Pat Rooney, entertains the company with the laughable story of the Piper of Clare. And so on to the end where, over a semiquaver bass that is not too academic, all join in sending the spirit of O'Connor up among the saints, where 'He'll pass through their middle, with stick and with fiddle, and they'll give him the cead mile fealta up there.' At a time when there is a dearth of new, singable, and enjoyable choral works, a cantata of this description should earn a ready welcome.

Mr. Harvey Grace's 'Fisher-folk lullaby' contains some interesting ideas. Without pretentiousness, it embodies some original thought. Into the treatment of a swaying nine-eight melody of familiar pattern the composer introduces atmospheric effects of voice and harmony; the one by frequent use of humming with a crooned vowel for vocal accompaniment, the other by a growing chromaticism that glides (where 'hungrily the waves are calling') into the whole-tone scale; or, rather, that portion of the melodic minor scale that is built of whole-tones. The part-song is a clever blend of melody and suggestion. The ending of each verse where a tenor melody in soft canonic imitation of the soprano sinks gently, over a short-cut cadence, into the tonic chord ppp, is bound to be highly effective. Mr. Grace's words are straightforward, sensible poetry, addressed by a fisher-wife to her child.

ANTHEMS.

To whom then will ye liken God? By Horatio Parker.

Christ our Passover. By Horatio Parker.

O brightness of the Immortal Father's face. By Mark Andrews.

[New York: The H. W. Gray Co.]

Of Mr. Parker's two anthems the first is by far the finer. It opens with a striking piece of choral declamation, followed by a tenor solo, with a well laid out accompaniment. The final section for soloist and choir is very telling. The work, which is for Advent or general use, is of moderate difficulty. 'Christ our Passover' is simpler, but in its bold and straightforward way is effective. Mr. Andrew's setting of a translation of the well-known evening hymn of Sophronius—familiar in England as 'O Gladsome Light'—is for five voices (S.A.T.B.B.) a cappella. The music is well written and suitable for a good average choir, though one or two climaxes would yield their full effect only with a large choral body.

Nocturne for String Orchestra. By William H. Speer.

[London: Stainer & Bell, Ltd.]

A melodious and expressive essay for a string band, not very difficult as to its notes, but requiring refined treatment to do it full justice.

Novello's Anthem Book. A Collection of Popular Anthems for Festival and General use throughout the year. Books Nos. 10-15.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Each book of this series contains twelve anthems, apportioned thus—one for each of the seasons of Advent, Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide, and Harvest, three for Lent, and four for general use. Choirs thus have under one cover, at the cost of a shilling, a supply of anthems sufficient for the Church's year. The standard of difficulty is very moderate. A list of the contents of Book 10 will give an idea of the grade:—Advent: 'God shall wipe away all tears' (Field); Christmas: 'Sing, O Heavens' (Maunder); Lent: 'Jesu, Word of God Incarnate' (Elgar), 'Hear the voice and prayer' (Hopkins), 'By Babylon's wave' (Gounod); Easter: 'Unto the Paschal Victim bring' (West); Whitsuntide: 'Our blest Redeemer' (Hall); Harvest: 'Great is the Lord' (Sydenham); General: 'Blessed be the Lord my strength' (Markham Lee), 'Abide with me' (Atkins), 'O how amiable' (Maunder), 'The Lord is exalted' (West). The volumes are published in both notations. Now that unaccompanied singing is practised so much, it might be well to include in future selections at least one a cappella work of simple kind.

Prelude and Fugue in D major. For organ. By Alexander Glazounow. Op. 93.

[Breitkopf & Härtel.]

The brilliant Russian composer's début as a writer of organ music is a welcome sign of the interest now being taken in the organ as an independent instrument rather than as an ingenious contrivance for the serving-up of réchauffés of popular orchestral dishes. Evidently, too, he regards it as a medium for music of a severe type. His Prelude and Fugue is entirely free from traces of the vivid colour and bizarre rhythm we have been taught to expect from Russia. Instead we have music mainly diatonic, with polyphony which, while thoroughly interesting, is on the severe side. The work is fourteen pages in length, fairly difficult, and will be warmly welcomed by all who care for pure, scholarly organ music.

Four Songs of Tennyson. By A. C. Mackenzie. (a) 'Beat upon mine, little heart'; (b) 'Love flew in at the window'; (c) 'The milkmaid's song'; (d) 'The bee buzz'd up in the heat.'

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

These charming settings of well-known lyrics should be useful additions to the repertory of singers who have at their command considerable freedom of style. All are short, but the composer has managed to include in a small space plenty of interest, both melodic and harmonic. Perhaps the most attractive of the set is the first, a really beautiful little song, full of tender feeling, while the fourth, with its happy little descriptive touches, is also fascinating in a different way. The songs are published in pairs (a) (b), and (c) (d).

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis. Set to Gregorian Tones, with verses in Faux-bourdon. By Orlando Gibbons; by Whitbrooke and Knight; and by 'Anon.' and Thomas Causton. Edited by Francis Burgess and Royle Shore.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

These useful additions (Nos. 897, 898, and 899) of old English music to 'Novello's Parish Choir Book' series are well worthy of revival. The Gibbons is especially fine. The 'Anon.' and Causton settings are for A.T.B.B., and will be useful on occasions when boys' voices are not available.

No. 67.

THE NAVAL AND MILITARY MUSICAL UNION.

The operations of this Union, which consist mainly in organizing choral competitions in connection with the Services, have lately developed so greatly that it was decided at a meeting of the vice-presidents and the executive committee, held on November 11, 1913, to re-organize the scheme on a wider basis. Mr. Harold Boulton, C.V.O., presided. H.R.H. The Duke of Connaught, H.R.H. Prince Arthur of Connaught, Field-Marshal Sir John French, H.S.H. Prince Louis of Battenberg, and many other distinguished officers of both Services were added to the list of vice-presidents, which already included many well-known names.

It was decided to form general councils for England, Scotland, and Ireland, and that each Naval Fleet Command and each Military District Command should be represented thereon by three officers, one of whom should be, if possible, the Officer Commanding-in-Chief ex officio. The Local Branches, constituted as at present, will thus be primarily responsible to their own Command and not to the central executive as heretofore.

The constitution of the Union will be as follows: The president; distinguished and representative senior officers of both Services, or other distinguished gentlemen who have evinced an interest in the movement, as vice-presidents; a general council, combining England, Scotland, and Ireland, the Overseas Dominions, and India, as detailed above, and including also the present members of the central council; an executive committee of four members, to include, if possible, one Naval officer, one Army officer; an honorary secretary, and an assistant-secretary; a treasurer.

It is realised that if any definite progress is to be made in the work of the Union, the finance must be placed upon a proper and stable basis, and that, if possible, an annual income should be secured. To meet this necessity, it was decided that so soon as the reconstitution of the Union is secured, a circular letter be addressed to the Mess-president of each of H.M. Ships and of every Regiment, giving details of the work of the Union, and inviting an annual subscription of one guinea from each Mess. Thereafter, and if necessary for any special occasions, the City Livery Companies might suitably be approached. It was, however, agreed that subscriptions from Naval and Military Messes would prove the more desirable contributions.

The members present desired to record an expression of cordial appreciation of the interest evinced by the president of the Union, Colonel Sir H. L. Smith-Dorrien, K.C.B., D.S.O., A.D.C., and of the material assistance which he is affording in so many directions.

New offices have been secured for the Union at the premises of the Royal Institute of Public Health, 37, Russell Square

THE TODMORDEN MALE-VOICE CHOIR.

This Lancashire male-voice choir was formed in June, 1906, at the instigation of its present conductor, Mr. Harold Lees, a young man of a humble station in life, and apart from a life-long love for, and interest in, part-singing, of no proved musical ability and certainly of no musical training. The Choir was at first composed of twenty voices, practically all drawn from the mills in the district. The first competition the Choir attended was in June, 1907, at Lytham, where the third-prize in the class for small choirs was secured. In order to pay the Festival entrance fee of 7s. 6d. a special levy of 4d. per member was made, and each member paid his own expenses. Since that date the Choir has been competing continually, and is never without some test-pieces in preparation. Altogether forty competitions have been attended and thirty-four prizes secured, including eighteen firsts, eleven seconds, and five third-prizes, and at one time the Choir had four challenge shields in its possession. At present it holds the Grundy Challenge Shield and the Lytham Silver Scroll. The Choir is the only one which has won both the Sharples Shield (alto lead) and the Grundy Challenge Shield (tenor lead) at the Blackpool Festival. Other notable successes were the first-prizes at Douglas, New Brighton, and Llandudno, and second-prize at Morecambe in 1911, all between May and October. In 1911 the Choir suffered a most serious blow in the breakdown in health of Mr. Lees, and he was absent for two years. Things would have gone very hard for the Choir during that period but for the generous action of Mr. Lawson Berry, of the Nelson Arion Glee Union. Mr. Berry came to its assistance, and conducted the Choir at the Morecambe Festival, which was due a week after Mr. Lees's breakdown. Mr. Berry had charge of the Choir for about twelve months, and afterwards, until Mr. Lees's return, one of the members, Mr. S. Beaumont, conducted. It is one of the ironies of competitions that at New Brighton and Blackpool Mr. Lawson Berry's own Choir should come second to Todmorden. But the incident goes to show the fine spirit in which both these Choirs, and Mr. Lawson Berry, work. There is a good deal more of this agreeable side of competition going on than is known to superficial critics of the movement. Mr. Lees returned early in 1913, and since then has gained successes at Lytham, New Brighton, Blackpool, and Keighley.

The Choir is self-supporting. The only sources of income are members' subscriptions, prize money, and the proceeds of an annual concert. The amount of prize money won in the six and a-half years is £307 16s., and the amount spent in fares and entry fees during the same period is £303 14s. 6d. Members pay for their own meals when away at competitions. The Choir has no other means except those stated above, and it is a proud boast of the members that not a single penny in the way of outside subscriptions has ever been asked for. The Choir now numbers about fifty members, and holds two rehearsals weekly.

MUSICAL v. VERBAL PHRASING.

To the Editor of THE COMPETITION FESTIVAL RECORD.

DEAR SIR,—Reluctant as I am to write again on the subject of my letter in last month's issue before others have expressed their opinion, I am constrained to do so because of your kind though somewhat unusual criticism appended. I had hoped that I made my case clear, but as you seem to attribute to me too great a fondness for the comma, I must state that I should no more dream of observing every punctuation mark than I would hesitate to insert a 'breath' where there was no such mark. If it be supposed that I would ask a choir to 'break' after every 'yet' and 'say' in 'Go, song of mine,' then my point has been entirely missed.

As instances of what I referred to in this piece, take bar 12 (not counting the first incomplete bar), where the last note of the motif (first heard in bar 3) is shortened. Here a break between 'dust' and 'and' seems necessary, yet who would make such a break when playing the phrase on a violin? (a). Or, bar 42, altos and second tenor, a breath after 'shrine' is both physically and rhetorically necessary, yet thereby the rhythmic motif () used in the next bar for 'guide his soul' is distorted, i.e., from the purely abstract standpoint (b). 'My love dwelt' overflows with such instances. Take two, as typical. Unless you can find a chorus soprano (I have never met one) to sing the phrase:

And far away the sand
And gray wash of the waves were seen
The woven forest-boughs between.'

(c = 60, last two bars ritenuto) with one breath, where shall she breathe? The music demands the breath after 'waves,' the verbal phrase calls for it before the adverbial extension following 'seen' (c). Again, bar 42, the point is utterly lost if no break is made after 'till.' But who would play it thus? I have heard the Belfast Philharmonic Society, under Koeller, produce an overwhelming effect with such a break here, but I was most severely criticised by two eminent English judges for doing the same thing (d).

As to the Lieder you referred to last month, I cannot speak of the Wolff song, not knowing it, further than to say that apart from any musical considerations, it seems peculiar to take no breath after 'gefällt,' and then to take it after 'Tränen,' which is merely a vocative noun, the following comma being of little moment. In 'Die Forelle' I can only say, with all respect, that it is beside the point to quote it, since Fräulein Gerhardt's breathing, and indeed Schubert's music phrases, coincide in every instance with the sense of the words.

The crux of the matter is found in hymns. Since writing last month I have been reading Dr. Madeley Richardson's book on 'Choir training.' His chapter on this subject expresses my views so much better than any words of mine could do, that I will conclude by referring your readers to it, while thanking you for your friendly review of my last letter.

Coleraine, Ireland.

E. N. HAY.

[We are glad to insert Mr. Hay's reply to our comments (to which we must refer readers who desire to follow the discussion). Mr. Hay shows a due appreciation of the difficulty there is sometimes in reconciling musical and verbal demands; whereas it is only too certain that many vocal performers and choral conductors give the matter little or no intelligent consideration. But, as we have already pointed out, even when there is an effort to balance conflicting claims, opinions may differ. Thus, regarding Mr. Hay's typical case (a), we should end both the musical and the verbal phrases at 'dust,' and we think violinists would agree to this phrasing, as the music invites it. Again, at (b), to us it seems that music and words agree as to phrasing, and the essential character of the musical phrase is not injured by the only possible verbal treatment. As to (c) we have always felt this to be a specially difficult case. The overlapping of the phrasing of the vocal parts provides some alleviation. 'Were seen' in the treble part should, we think, be phrased musically according to the verbal sense and in order to agree with the tenor and bass. At (d) the composer does not invite a gap between 'till' and 'like.' The tenuto mark, plus the swell, show this. But all the same 'till' could rhetorically be slightly isolated without destroying the feeling that it is part of the ensuing musical phrase. Even a rest does not always break the mental feeling for a phrase. We do not suppose Mr. Hay suffered very much from the two eminent adjudicators unless he overdid the isolation of 'till.' We know from personal experience what Dr. Koeller (who has now retired) could accomplish by way of interpretation; he was a master in this art. We hope that the fruit of this discussion will be that more thought will be devoted to its subject.]

We are requested to make known a series of choral competitions which are to be held at Dieppe in July. From 150 to 200 Societies are expected to take part. It is desired that Societies from Great Britain should join, and all that come are promised a welcome and some special facilities. Sight-singing is to be made a gate which must be passed in order to qualify for the higher divisions. Full particulars will be sent to applicants to M. L. Brau, secretary for English Correspondence (Comité des Fêtes), Syndicat d'Initiative, Dieppe.

CHORAL TECHNIQUE & INTERPRETATION

BY

HENRY COWARD.

MUS. DOC. OXON.

PRESS NOTICES.

"The title and the author's name together will be sufficient to secure for this book a wide circle of musical readers. No one has done more than Dr. Henry Coward to further the remarkable advance in choral technique which has been so efficient in this country in recent years. Dr. Coward has spent his life in perfecting a system of choral training which he has exemplified in his Sheffield Choir, and carried triumphantly over the English-speaking world and even further. In this book he tells precisely what this system is and so fortifies precept with example, illustrating his points with quotations from musical masterpieces, that it places a valuable manual of instruction in the hands of every choir-master. It has been his aim to give 'such advice and instruction that no single problem connected with choral singing shall remain unsolved.' Those who know his work will not need to be assured that the book is eminently practical, but it may be added that it is written in the plain and forthright style which is characteristic of the author."—The Times, January 15, 1914.

"What that method is, and how it may be applied to choral singing, is told unreservedly and lucidly in Dr. Coward's book 'Choral technique and interpretation.' This book is something more than an exhaustive and, to choral conductors, an invaluable text-book of what may be conveniently described as 'choralism.' It is an unconscious autobiography of one of the most notable figures in the world of music. Henry Coward has written himself into these pages. We can visualise the man as he stands before a chorus, sure of himself, blunt and forceful, labouring at an idea, and gradually crystallising it into an apt phrase or a still more felicitous quotation or anecdote; persistent, insistent, prepared to bully or wheedle a choir into submission, and finally 'getting there' by sheer force of his genial, dogged, characterful personality. He has put into the book, freely and fully, all he knows. He lays out for the benefit of inexperience all the harvest of thirty years of labour, study, and a degree of minute specialisation which in choral music has no parallel among even the great choir-trainers who preceded or are contemporary with him."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph, December 26, 1913.

"Dr. Coward's great work, the publication of which has been eagerly anticipated by conductors, voice-trainers, and choralists generally, is hot from the press. In it the father of British choralism—that is to say choralism with art in it—gives away all his secrets. Aspiring organists and choir-masters have long sat at his feet eager to learn the secret of the marvellous power that the Sheffield doctor has wielded over the thousands of choralists with whom he has come in contact. Some of them by assiduous attention have assimilated some of the methods of the master; but it has been realised that behind the whole there is the personality of the man, his grit, his grip, his intense earnestness, and his determination to achieve success, however exacting the task before him."—Sheffield Independent, December 20, 1913.

"Dr. Henry Coward is by reputation possibly the most successful master of choral training in England. He has figured at the Festivals, and enjoys the credit of having developed choral singing to a very high level at Sheffield, Huddersfield, Leeds, and Newcastle. In his book on 'Choral Technique and Interpretation' he gives away all the tricks of his trade."—The Scotsman, January 8, 1914.

"Dr. Henry Coward, conductor of the famous Sheffield Choir, has made a very valuable contribution to the series of handbooks for musicians (edited by Mr. Ernest Newman) by producing a somewhat unique volume dealing with choral technique and interpretation. It is unique in this sense that it is quite modern, and embodies the actual experience of the author who has had experience which falls to the lot of few conductors. The book should be possessed by all choir trainers."—The Bristol Times and Mirror, January 15, 1914.

"The author is one of the most brilliant examples of a man climbing from unpropitious surroundings to a high artistic plane, and it is always interesting to learn the factors that have contributed to such marked advancement. For many years past Dr. Coward held the first place as a conductor of choral societies, and although of late years several other musicians have shown themselves equally capable of securing fine performances, he must always be regarded as laying the foundation of what may be termed the new choral technique. Dr. Coward therefore writes with the authority of one who has verified the truth of his theories and proved the correctness of his methods by practical results of the most convincing kind. Choir trainers may not always agree with Dr. Coward's views of interpretation, and, truth to tell, they are more technical than æsthetic, but it is not too much to say that in this book will be found all the chief principles of the impressive delivery of choral music. Moreover, the book is written with a directness and clearness of expression which reminds one of the learned professor's answer to the young lady who expressed her enjoyment of his recent lecture: 'I am so glad you were able to follow me. I took great care that what I said should be understood by the meanest intelligence.'"—The Referee, January 11, 1914.

"There can be no doubt that few living musicians are better entitled to discourse on the subject of choral singing than Dr. Coward, whose book on 'Choral technique and interpretation' is certain to be widely read, and its precepts carefully considered. As a conductor his interpretations may not always commend themselves to one's judgment, but as a choir-trainer it is no exaggeration to assert that his labours have marked a new era in chorus-singing. For this reason his clear exposition of the methods by which he has achieved his aims has an obvious value, and his book is the more readable because of the lively style and genial enthusiasm that characterise it. His description of his conduct of a rehearsal is full of suggestive points by which every choir-trainer may profit, whether he employ them with literal exactitude or not."—Yorkshire Post, January 14, 1914.

Obituary.

It is with deep regret that we record the death of RAOUL PUGNO, the famous pianist, which occurred at Moscow on January 3. M. Pugno was a familiar figure on the London concert-platform and a great favourite with British audiences. The delicacy, restraint, and withal the high expressive significance of his playing were well known, and constituted a model that was recognised over two continents. A few years ago he and M. Vsaye gave a memorable series of Beethoven Sonata recitals at Queen's Hall. M. Pugno was born at Monrouge, France, on June 23, 1852. He became a pupil at the Paris Conservatoire, where he won the first pianoforte prize in 1866. In 1896 he returned to the Conservatoire as professor of the pianoforte. His compositions include an Oratorio, 'La résurrection de Lazare,' four operettas, several ballets, and numerous pieces for the pianoforte.

We regret to announce also the following deaths :

PATRICK WESTON JOYCE, LL.D., M.R.I.A., at his residence, Leinster Road, Rathmines (Dublin), on January 7, 1914. Born at Ballyorgan, co. Limerick, in May, 1827, he graduated LL.D. at Dublin University, and was not only a musician but an archæologist, historian, and teacher. Even as a boy he supplied Dr. Petrie with many Irish airs, and he was an ardent collector of Irish music. His hobby lasted for over sixty years, and he published three separate collections, the most valuable of which is 'Old Irish Folk-Music'—a collection of over 800 songs and airs—in 1909, in his eighty-second year. His 'Social History of Ancient Ireland' (2 vols., Longmans & Co.) and his 'Short History of Ireland' (1900) are standard works, while it is of interest to recall that one of the stories in his 'Old Celtic Romances' furnished Tennyson with the theme of 'The Voyage of Maeldune.' Three weeks before his death Dr. Joyce published the third volume of his 'Irish Names of Places,' which was the completion of a work first issued over half-a-century ago.

To lovers of Irish music the name of Dr. Joyce will for ever be bracketed with Bunting, Petrie, Forde, and Levey, and his three collections form a valuable quarry for those who wish to make use of ancient Celtic melodies. Two years ago he started a fourth volume, but ere its completion was stricken down with what proved to be a fatal illness, and he passed away in his eighty-seventh year.

Dr. Joyce was for years Principal of the Marlborough Street Training College for Teachers, and in 1906 he was elected President of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland. He was also one of the Vice-Presidents of the Irish Folk-Song Society (London), and one of the Commissioners for the publication of the Brehon Laws. Although, by his own desire, his funeral was private, yet the Lord Lieutenant was represented at the obsequies, as were also several prominent members of the Royal Irish Academy.

Mrs. GEORGINA WELDON, at Brighton, on January 11. Her maiden name was Thomas, which she changed to Treherne. She was born at Clapham, on May 24, 1837. In 1860 she married Captain Weldon, of the 18th Hussars. She possessed an exceptionally beautiful voice. At first she sang in public as an amateur, and later, in 1870, she entered the profession. She sang at the Popular Concerts, the Crystal Palace, the Philharmonic, and other concerts of high repute. She attracted the attention of Gounod during his stay in this country, and they became intimate friends, but ultimately a quarrel led her to bring a libel action against Gounod, and she was awarded heavy damages. Litigation was a passion with her, and for many years she was almost constantly in the Law Courts. She composed a few songs that had fair vogue.

ARTHUR CLOUGH, who died suddenly at his residence at Wexford on Christmas Day, 1913. Born in 1847, he had filled various organ appointments in Ireland, and in 1911 was given the post of organist of Wexford Parish Church. He was a good, sound organist of the old school, and was well respected in private life.

The REV. ALBERT BARFF, vicar of St. Giles's, Cripplegate, and prebendary of St. Paul's Cathedral, on December 28. He was master at St. Paul's Choir School, where his reforms were of lasting and far-reaching benefit.

RICHARD GREEN, the well-known baritone singer, on January 16, at the age of forty-nine. He was once closely connected with Gilbert and Sullivan opera, and created the part of Prince John in 'Ivanhoe.'

FRANÇOIS CELLIER, on January 4, at the age of sixty-four. He was long associated, as conductor, with the Gilbert and Sullivan productions at the Savoy Theatre.

VALENTINE ZUBIAURRE, a Spanish composer of wide reputation, born at Cayay in 1837.

ALFRED COUTTS, for many years a music-seller in Sauciehall Street, Glasgow.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS' ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

The twenty-ninth annual Conference of this Society was held at the Hotel Cecil, London, on December 29, 30, 31, and January 1, 2, and 3. It had features of interest and importance, although it did not in these respects surpass the previous Conference held at Birmingham. Four concerts were given, and three papers were read by gentlemen who were able to speak with authority on the subjects chosen. The chairmen at the various meetings were Dr. W. H. Cummings, Dr. A. H. Mann, Dr. H. W. Richards, and Mr. G. W. Bebbington. The music committee consisted of Mr. J. Carlowitz Ames, Mr. Harold Hankins, Mr. Stanley Hawley, Dr. E. Markham Lee, and Mr. Orlando Morgan.

The opening reception was held at the Grand Hall, Hotel Cecil, on the evening of December 29. A programme of music was provided by Miss M. H. Palgrave-Turner, Mr. Gordon Cleather, Mr. Webster Millar (vocalists), Mr. Clyde Twelvetees (violoncello), and Señor Carlos Sobrino (pianist), with Mr. Stanley Hawley as accompanist.

On the following morning, after a special service at St. Stephen's Walbrook, and a sermon upon music by the Rev. R. S. de Courcy Laffan, Rector of the Church, the opening meeting took place at the Mansion House, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, who delivered an address of welcome on behalf of the City of London. Dr. Cummings was chairman. The business of the meeting was the selection of a town in which to hold the next Conference. Harrogate was chosen from a list that included also Brighton, Buxton, Cardiff, Liverpool, Margate, and Oxford. In the afternoon members were invited to visit Westminster Abbey, under the personal guidance of Sir Frederick Bridge.

In the evening the following chamber concert was given at the Grand Hotel by the London String Quartet, Miss Carrie Tubb (vocalist), and Miss Irene Scharrer (pianist) :

Pianoforte quartet	H. Holstenholme
Phantasy for string quartet	H. Waldo Warner
'Song Offerings'	London Ronald
Miniature Suite for string quartet	Hubert Bath
Pianoforte ('Reflets dans l'eau'	Debussy
Soli ('Rhapsodie'	Dohnányi
String quartet in D minor	Glazounov

The first four works in this list were new. Each was characteristic of the well-known style of the composer, the greatest advance and merit perhaps being seen in the Phantasy by Mr. Warner (the viola-player of the quartet party), who showed ability to handle a modern idiom with considerable firmness and invention. The songs by Mr. Ronald were settings of four Bengalese lyrics of Rabindranath Tagore. The accompaniments were played by the composer.

On December 31, under the presidency of Dr. A. H. Mann, Mr. Norman O'Neill, musical director at the Haymarket Theatre, read a paper on

'MUSIC TO STAGE PLAYS.'

Mr. O'Neill began by giving historical evidence that in England, more than in any other country, music had been in constant association with the performance of stage plays. He instanced a 'Miracle play' of 1512, and a number of stage directions in Shakespeare's plays that showed clearly that the dramatist intended music to accompany action and dialogue. Hatton's music to Charles Kean's Shakespearean productions was referred to, and the works of Sullivan, Edward German, and others.

Mr. O'Neill classified music for the theatre under three heads: (1.) Incidental music—which might or might not be specially composed for the play; (2.) Entr'actes and interlude music; (3.) Music which was specially written for a play, and which was an essential part of the production. The term 'incidental music' was sometimes, and he thought correctly, applied to marches, dances, and songs which were incidental to the action of the play, but it was also applied to what was called 'melodrama,' music which accompanied the dialogue and reflected the feeling and emotion of the spoken lines. Such music usually played a subsidiary part; it usually accompanied the most sentimental passages in the play, and played a part similar to that of the limelight man—following the hero and heroine most obstinately. This type was usually most primitive in construction. In general it consisted of an eight-bar phrase, repeated ad libitum during a speech, and it was very often heard forty or fifty times in the course of a play. Its use, if it could be so called, was to remind the audience of a previous situation. When the hero lay in prison, for instance, memories of the 'old home' and his first meeting with the heroine were called up, and of course the old tune turned up too. Music and drama of this sort had no great artistic value. The music was simply called in to bolster up the weakness of the drama. He did not think audiences cared for it, for he had a high opinion of the theatre public; it was a certain type of actor who clung to this tradition of melodrama.

Mr. O'Neill said his conclusion was that it was not always so much the intrinsic value of the music as its appropriateness and aptness which made it successful from the theatrical point of view. He did not say, of course, that music of a higher order might not have these qualifications also; indeed, it constantly had. The composer to-day who had knowledge and experience would find as much sympathy, intelligence, and understanding for his work in the theatre as he would elsewhere.

Under the heading of Entr'acte music Mr. O'Neill placed music which was played between the scenes and acts of plays, and which did not accompany the action of the play. Effective and suitable music between the scenes could be of artistic value. Especially if there was an entire change of sentiment from the one scene to the other, the music could in more ways than one fill up the gap. In many theatres the entr'acte music was always more or less in keeping with the play. Thus they had in a serious play music of a more or less serious nature, and in a light comedy music of a lighter nature. If carried too far this was apt to defeat its own ends. Some people held, however, quite the opposite view, and thought the entr'acte music should be in direct contrast to the play, the idea being to keep up the spirits of the audience, and gave them galops and two-steps, rag-time and tangos in the entr'actes of a farce or of a serious play. The experiment had been tried of having quartets and quintets by the great masters played as entr'actes in some theatres, but he could not see the reason for this. Music of this kind seemed utterly out of place in a theatre. The quartets of Beethoven, Brahms, or Schubert could by no stretch of the imagination be termed theatre music. Those who were really fond of chamber-music, and would probably like to listen, were quite unable to do so on account of the noise made by others who naturally wished to talk about the play in the interval and did not care a rap about the music. The only place where it was possible to play music of a more serious nature was at the beginning of the programme, before the stalls and the dress-circle arrived.

It never seemed to have struck composers to write entr'acte music or even an overture to any of our modern plays. Why, for instance, should a composer not be inspired to write a set of movements to Mr. Shaw's plays? He did not mean only for performance in the theatre, for the orchestral material was there usually limited, but also for the concert-room.

Dealing with music that was an essential feature of a play, Mr. O'Neill said that in this class he would, of course, not include what were known as musical plays and musical comedies. Under this heading he placed Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer night's dream' music, Edward German's music to 'Henry VIII.,' Humperdinck's to 'Königskinder,' and Bizet's to 'L'Arlésienne.' The last-mentioned was, to his mind, one of the most perfect examples of a play with music. In all of these the music had become as celebrated as the play, and the successful performance of the play was to a very great extent dependent on the music. In 'Königskinder' Humperdinck had attempted to measure the dialogue and music so exactly that it was necessary for the actors to be musicians if his idea was to be correctly carried out. A rhythmic vocal part was written in the score, to be spoken in time with the music. Mr. O'Neill did not look upon the experiment as successful.

The promiscuous introduction of music into a play of Shakespeare seemed to Mr. O'Neill quite inartistic and pointless. There should always be some good artistic reason, or actual necessity, for music. In his opinion very little music was required during the action of most of Shakespeare's plays, but almost all of them gave the composer opportunities for expressing himself appropriately, if at no great length.

In fantastic plays in which there was a fairy, or mystic, or even supernatural element, music might, and constantly quite rightly did, play an important and essential part, and could quite legitimately accompany the dialogue. Music should step in where the play itself, the actors, and the stage effect could no longer carry on the illusion. A great many of the romantic and fantastic poetical plays produced in recent years would come in this category. Any play which it would be impossible to perform without music would belong to this type: a play in which songs and dances were essential; a play in which dramatic effects depended on the music for their adequate expression; a play in which effects of scenery and lighting were illustrated by music. He thought it evident that this was the type of work which gave the greatest scope to the musician.

It was not enough for a composer only to know the play through and through, but he must also be in close touch with the exact spirit in which the work was to be given. Where music was to accompany the dialogue he must, before writing any music, know the tempo of the speeches, the pauses and business to be introduced, so that his music might coincide in the minutest detail with the stage rendering of the play. He would otherwise find his musical effects clashing or coming in the wrong place. Where music accompanied the action and there was no dialogue, as for instance in a procession or entrances of characters, most careful adjustment was necessary, the producer and composer working together and arranging the time that any such effect or business would take on the stage. Where there was no dialogue, the stage business should be timed to the music. Where there was dialogue the music should be timed to the stage. It was obviously much easier for the composer to accompany the actors in speeches, than it would be for actors to follow the music. This was where, to his mind, 'Königskinder' failed.

Mr. O'Neill gave instances from an Irish play and from Maeterlinck's 'The Blue Bird' where he had been put to the necessity of close adjustment of music to action. The music in such cases could not be written down until the actors were word-perfect, and combined rehearsal with pianoforte was possible. The difficulties attendant on music to a change of scene were referred to.

All music that actually accompanied the spoken lines should be mainly scored for strings, which mixed far better with the human voice than did wood-wind instruments. Harps, horns, and timpani—softly, of course—could also be used effectively, and, to quote Bizet, the lower notes of the flute also.

In cases where a great deal of music occurred during the action of a play Mr. O'Neill was not in favour of having long preludes to the Acts. A short prelude with the lights lowered in the theatre was much more likely to produce the desired effect than a long entr'acte to which nobody would feel inclined to listen. If the theatre were thrown into darkness at the commencement of the music the audience were at once in a receptive mood. The composer should in a few bars endeavour to express the feeling of the coming scene, and the curtain should rise on the last notes of his little prelude, thus as it were completing a circle of light and sound. The sudden putting out of lights in the theatre was in itself so ominous that obviously this proceeding was only in keeping with certain situations. For others it was more effective to lower the house lights gradually, and with the aid of the music to lead the attention of the audience to a gradually disclosed scene.

Mr. O'Neill concluded with a consideration of the suitable size and constitution of a theatre orchestra.

Illustrations to the lecture were supplied by the Haymarket Theatre Orchestra, under Mr. O'Neill's direction. They included selections of music to 'Henry VIII,' and Mr. O'Neill's own music to Lord Dunsany's play, 'The Golden Doom,' which Mr. Lyall Swete recited.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.

This is now the strongest musical feature of the gathering. On this occasion the following programme was presented:

'Humoreske for Orchestra,' Op. 47 Norman O'Neill
First performance. Specially composed for this occasion.

Concerto for Pianoforte, in F minor M. Esposito
First performance in England.
Specially composed for this occasion.
Solo Pianoforte, THE COMPOSER.

'The Outlaw,' Ballad for Baritone and Orchestra.
Words and Music by William Wallace
Baritone Solo, MR. CHARLES KNOWLES.

Orchestral Tone-poem, 'A Phantasy of Life and Love'
.. .. Sir Frederic Cowen

Elégie and Rondo, for Violin and Orchestra Emile Sauret
Violin Solo, THE COMPOSER.

Orchestral Tone-poem, 'The Legend Beautiful,' Op. 48A James Lyon

Sir Frederic Cowen conducted his own piece, the Concerto, and M. Sauret's work. The other orchestral items were conducted by their several composers. Mr. O'Neill's work exhibits sane and otherwise excellent ideas, and effective scoring. Mr. Esposito's Concerto contains much to admire, notwithstanding its tendency to over-elaboration; some of the themes have obvious charm, and their treatment is musicianly. Mr. William Wallace's song is a good specimen of his peculiar genius for expressing introspective and dramatic moods, and it was very well sung by Mr. Knowles. Sir Frederic Cowen's work and M. Emile Sauret's are not recent compositions, but they were not the less welcome on that account. The Tone-poem is one of the best of Sir Frederic's orchestral works; the violin solo is full of good things, and moreover, admirably written to exhibit the resources of the instrument. Mr. James Lyon is an earnest and industrious composer. He attempted a difficult task in endeavouring to portray Longfellow's poem. If the connection of music and poetry was at times obscure, it was at least pleasant to follow the music for its own sake, and weave one's own story. The composer has undoubted imaginative gifts.

On January 1, Mr. Frank Roscoe (secretary of the Teachers' Registration Council) gave an address on 'THE PLACE OF MUSIC IN A NATIONAL SYSTEM OF EDUCATION.'

Dr. Richards, who presided, said the view that music had a very distinct place in any national system of education was, happily, becoming more and more recognised by those who had charge of education in this country; and it was to be hoped that as music progressed as an art its value as an educational subject would be even more fully appreciated. Not long ago any serious study of music, especially by boys, was considered to be quite infra dig. It was curious that this feeling should ever have arisen, because, as all students of history must know, in the times of Henry VIII. and the Stuarts it was considered an integral part of a gentleman's education that he should be able to take a part in any vocal music and read at sight.

Mr. Roscoe said that what was required was that in every large school, and in every group of small schools, there should be attached to the staff a trained musician able to maintain a high standard of achievement, to exercise well-informed taste and judgment in the choice of songs, to suggest exercises and methods of teaching which would develop the vocal powers of the pupils and enable them to understand the language of music. In the higher stages of our educational system also there should be a far more systematic recognition of music as an element in the course. Here, as he had said, music was too often regarded as a luxury, something outside the range of ordinary school interests, and a form of mild eccentricity. All this was purely destructive of music as an art in its wide social aspect. He thought that many a boy leaving school was painfully limited in the range of his enthusiasms. The boy had learned to be ashamed of a large number of things, rightly in some cases and wrongly in others. But they might be quite certain that one thing would never cause in the boy's breast the slightest pang of shame, and that was his inability to sing or to play an instrument, or to distinguish one tune from another. With regard to registration he said that those who were interested took the view that the work of teaching in every form needed to have a higher status in the estimation of the public. There was no way of doing that except by putting the work of teaching on a professional basis. That meant that they must have some means of providing that the word 'teacher' should in future mean something definite—a certain measure of attainment in the subject, a certain capability of imparting it, and a certain experience in teaching it.

Dr. W. H. Cummings trusted that the movement to advance the teaching of music would eventually make England what it once was—a land of song.

Mr. J. Dawber (Wigan) said it had taken the Society of Musicians thirty years to bring the public to their present position in regard to music, and he feared it would take another thirty years to get to where they ought to be.

Mr. A. T. Akeroyd (Ilkley) said that most of the prominent public schools, such as Eton, Harrow, Rugby, and Uppingham, had for many years been cultivating vocal and instrumental music in a most magnificent manner.

On the afternoon of January 1 Mr. Alfred Kalisch read a paper entitled

'WHAT ATTITUDE SHOULD TEACHERS ADOPT TOWARDS MODERN MUSIC?'

He said that the teacher's first duty was to inculcate in his pupil such sound laws of art, as would enable him in his turn to form such reliable judgments that he would not be carried away by mere novelty nor prejudiced against what was new merely because it was new. He insisted on the evolutionary influences in musical development. Just as there was nothing good in modern English that had not its roots deep in the fruitful soil of the Authorized Version, so there was nothing great and beautiful in music that could not trace a legitimate pedigree to Bach. It was wrong, however, to disregard modern phenomena. It used to be assumed that music teachers should adopt an historical method, beginning with Bach. Mr. Kalisch recommended serious attention to the newer views as to the advisability of letting students begin with modern music, views which are set forth in Mr. Tobias Matthay's new book on 'Musical Interpretation.' The reformer in music must be a Janus facing both to the future and to the past, and it was the duty of the teacher never to neglect, or let his pupil neglect, this elementary truth. He must remember that the vast majority of pupils are destined to be listeners only and not performers or composers. The best guide in valuing the music of to-day was to find out what elements of the music of the past had survived in it. A further rule was that music of to-day must not be judged by the canons of the past.

The discussion that ensued was sustained by Dr. H. W. Richards (chairman of the meeting), Dr. Cummings, Dr. Markham Lee, and Mr. Carl Gressler.

A chamber concert was given in the evening by the following artists: Mr. Eugène Goossens, jun. (1st violin and violin solo), Mr. Charles Woodhouse (2nd violin), Mr. Alfred Hobday (viola), Mr. C. Crabbe (violin-cello), Mr. Victor Borlée (flute), Mr. Dawes (clarinet), Mr. Adolf Goossens (horn), Miss Miriam Timothy (harp), Miss Phyllis Lett and Mr. Ivor Foster (vocalists). The instrumental numbers were as follows:

'Phantasy' for string quartet, flute, clarinet, horn, and harp Eugène Goossens, jun.
Violin solo, 'Poème' (Op. 25) Chausson
Introduction and Allegro for harp, string quartet, flute, and clarinet Ravel
Harp solo, 'Arabesque' York Bowen
Prelude for harp and string quartet Julius Harrison

On January 2 Mr. C. W. Bebbington presided over the annual general meeting of the Society, at which the general secretary, Mr. A. T. Cummings, read the annual report. In the afternoon a number of members visited Westminster Cathedral, where a special service had been arranged by Dr. R. R. Terry. The music included Palestrina's eight-part Magnificat, Peter Philips's eight-part 'Alma Redemptoris,' and the following carols:—'Tryste Noël' and

'As Joseph was a-walking,' by Dr. Terry, 'Geboren ein Kindlein,' by Praetorius (1609), and 'A Virgin most pure' (Old English).

The annual dinner was held on the evening of January 2, under the chairmanship of Dr. Cummings, who gave a brief résumé of the progress and position of the Society, whose toast he proposed. Mr. W. D. Hall in replying referred to the raising of the standard qualifying for admission and the consequent benefit to the Society. Sir Frederic Cowen proposed 'The City of London,' with a reference to the Guildhall School of Music. Alderman Sir Ernest Cooper responded, and Messrs. R. Davies and Stewart Macpherson replied to the toast of 'The Visitors,' proposed by Dr. Richards.

MOUSSORGSKY.

At the meeting of the Musical Association, held on December 2, Mr. M. Montagu-Nathan read a paper on 'Moussorgsky.' He started by sketching the events which led to the formation of the 'Koutchka,' as the circle of five musicians—Balakirev, Cui, Borodine, Moussorgsky, and Rimsky-Korsakov—was called, and to the formulation of their principles and aims. These, with the first-named as their leader, devoted a large portion of their lives to the propagation of the principle of nationalism in music, enlisting also the help of Stassov, an art critic, and of Dargomijsky. The 'Koutchka,' however, did not by any means represent the views of all Russian composers, as was shown by a series of articles by Cui, in which Rubinstein and Tchaikovsky were treated as of inferior importance, and held to be Russian composers of music rather than composers of Russian music. Petersburg was the home of the nationalists, while the eclectics had their headquarters at Moscow. In his opera, 'The Stone Guest,' Dargomijsky embodied the essential reforms constituting the programme of the 'Koutchka,' but, with the exception of Moussorgsky, none of his companions was able to carry out his principles of melodic recitative. It was, however, rather in his general endeavour to create a realistic style of expression, which was the principal preoccupation of his precursor, than in the rigid adherence to the method of 'The Stone Guest' that Moussorgsky resembled Dargomijsky, and it is thus in his songs, more than in his two operas, that one can clearly trace the influence.

To call Moussorgsky a musical genius was to attach too much importance to his music as music. That term should be reserved for the composers who wrote marvellously beautiful music without being driven to do so by some extraneous idea. Moussorgsky's genius lay in making music the servant of a quite simple philosophy. He was a truthful man who desired above all things to establish a proper respect for the essential truths of life.

The lecturer recounted the biographical details of the composer, and said that the period 1866 to 1868 brought forth several works of importance, including 'La Nuit sur le Mont Chauve,' which was largely culled from the last scene of the third Act of his abandoned opera 'Salammbô.' The chief fruits of his labours were, however, some very characteristic songs, one of which showed him to be not only realist, but satirist. 'The matchmaker,' a setting of Gogol's comedy, shows that the composer was still under the influence of Dargomijsky. It was never completed, being laid aside in order to take up 'Boris Godounov,' which, begun in the autumn of 1868, was finished a year later. About a year later he remodelled it, and it was produced at Petersburg. Its reception was mixed, but at the time it was monopolising the thoughts of the musical world of the Russian capital Moussorgsky's own mind was devoted to a new opera, 'Khovanstchina.' His health was failing, but he managed to complete the opera with the exception of the last scene. This, together with the instrumentation, was left to the hand of Rimsky-Korsakov. He died on his forty-second birthday, March 16, 1881.

Moussorgsky had no mannerisms and perhaps no individual style. He never used the same formula twice. With all the force of which he was capable, he protested against the estimation of art as merely the glorification of the beautiful. The phrase 'Art for art's sake,' was to him an awful heresy. 'For me,' he said, 'art is a means of human intercourse.'

VACATION CONFERENCE ON MUSICAL EDUCATION.

This interesting and well-planned Conference was held at St. Paul's Girls' School, Brook Green, Hammersmith, on January 5 to 10. It was organized conjointly by the Music Teachers' Association, the Home Music Study Union, the Girls' School Music Union, and the Union of Directors of Music in Secondary Schools for Boys. The proceedings included opening and closing receptions, which were well attended, and afforded what is always a valuable feature of these gatherings, pleasant intimate social intercourse. At the Conference meetings Mr. Stewart Macpherson was well in evidence with his schemes for the advancement of Musical Appreciation, which he expounded eloquently. Mr. Frank Roscoe, secretary of the Teachers' Registration Council, gave a lecture on 'The training of teachers'; Miss Nancy Gilford dealt with 'The creative faculty in the pupil,' and brought forward some surprisingly good demonstrations of the training at the Royal Normal College for the Blind; Mr. Tobias Matthäus gave a luminous address on 'The study of Rubato'; Mr. J. G. Legge (Director of Education to the Liverpool Education Authority) spoke very fully on 'Class-singing as a vitalising force,' and made special reference to the work of Mr. W. L. Tomlins; Mr. Thomas Henderson gave very practical hints on 'The educational value of the singing class, with some points of technique'; Mr. Ernest Fowler had something very pertinent to say on 'The cultivation of musical judgment in teacher and pupil, with special reference to choice of music'; and Mrs. J. Spencer Curwen gave a lecture on 'The practical value of an elementary knowledge of psychology to the music-teacher,' which was one of the most useful and lucid of the whole series.

Besides the papers read there were discussions on various topics, presided over by Mr. Percy Scholes, Mr. J. T. Bavin, and Mr. W. W. Cobbett. One of the topics was 'The decline in the learning of stringed instruments, ensemble classes and how to encourage them,' which was opened by Dr. Percy Buck. On one afternoon many members of the Conference attended a service of 16th-century music at Westminster Cathedral, which was kindly arranged for by Dr. R. R. Terry. There was also a visit to Eton College on the invitation of Dr. Harford Lloyd, and to St. George's Chapel, Windsor, where special music, arranged for by Sir Walter Parratt, was given. All passed off pleasantly.

Many of the papers read are given nearly in full in the School Music Review for February. Mr. Arthur J. Hadrill was the obliging and hard-working secretary to the Conference.

HALIFAX MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

This choir, as recorded fully in our Competition Festival Record (November, 1913), won for three years in succession the chief prize at the Blackpool Festival. These victories led to the choir having the honour of a Command Performance at Windsor on November 21. On December 13 they repeated their 'Command' programme at Halifax before an overwhelming audience, and amazed many old-stagers in choral matters by their virtuosity. On January 6 a dinner was organized in their honour, and the local members of Parliament, The Mayor, Dr. McNaught, and many of the notabilities of the town, including Mr. Benson, the president of the Society, and Mr. Clement Holdsworth, president of the Halifax Choral Society, were present. The conductor, Mr. H. Shepley, was the recipient of a valuable memento of the victories of his choir, in the shape of a gold watch. The gathering was a very happy one. All the speeches duly extolled the achievements of the choir, which had brought so much credit to the town.

Mr. Josef Holbrooke, with a characteristic flood of sarcasm, announces a thirteenth series of British chamber-music concerts, to be held at the Arts Centre, Mortimer Street, on February 27, March 27, April 24, and May 29. The new works down for performance are a String quartet by Robert Ralph, pianoforte pieces by Frederick Kessler, Edward Mitchell, and Richard Cleveland, and songs by Leo France, Frederic Austin, and Mr. Holbrooke. The programmes include several of Mr. Holbrooke's chamber works, String quartets by Mr. Cyril Scott and Sir Alexander Mackenzie. Allusions are made in the prospectus to a mysterious foreign quartet of players, but further explanation is lacking.

MR. J. F. WHEELER.

FIFTY YEARS' SERVICE WITH MESSRS. NOVELLO AND CO.

We think we may be pardoned for making in our columns brief reference to the honourable career of an esteemed colleague, Mr. J. F. Wheeler, who this year completes half-century's connection with the printing office of Messrs. Novello & Co. In this important department, Mr. Wheeler has not only served the firm with a diligence and capacity which have been greatly appreciated by them, but incidentally—although behind the scenes—he has earned the thanks of numerous persons who have supplied 'copy,' and, we may add, especially of those responsible for bad 'copy.'

Mr. Wheeler was born in London on October 22, 1849, and he came to the firm on January 6, 1864, as an apprentice to the printing office (which was then in Dean's Yard, Dean Street, the music shop being at 69, Dean Street), in order, as the indenture quaintly says, 'to learn the art, trade, or business of a letterpress printer.' At that time the late Mr. Henry Littleton was the head of the House. Mr. Wheeler served as apprentice for seven years, and then for twenty years he was a music-type compositor. Next he became a 'music reader,' and continued in that capacity for another twenty years. During the last three years he has been a 'music reviser.' When he began his apprenticeship in 1864 there were no machine presses used by the firm—all the printing being done from plates by hand-presses, and only about twenty hands were employed in the printing department. During his fifty years' service, Mr. Wheeler has never swerved in his fidelity to the House.

Mr. Wheeler gained his early musical experience as a choir-boy at St. Barnabas' Church, Pimlico, during part of the time when the late Rev. Thomas Helmore was the choir-master here. He has done a little composition. Three of his chants are in the book 'A hundred Psalms,' compiled and edited by the late F. G. Edwards. He has also published some hymn-tunes, and has written words for school songs.

OPERA AT BLACKPOOL.

[BY OUR MANCHESTER CORRESPONDENT.]

Much the most commodious theatre in Lancashire (the recently-built New Theatre of Manchester apart) is Her Majesty's Opera House at Blackpool, part of the Winter Gardens property, where the annual Festival is held. The amenities of the place are much superior to anything elsewhere, and here, if anywhere, could a grand opera season of the highest type hope to succeed. At certain times of the year Blackpool is the resort of well-to-do leisure people drawn from many centres, able and willing to pay for good stuff; and this fact, added to the large size of the house, makes it possible for opera on the Denhof-Beecham scale to succeed. One is strengthened in this conviction by experiences during the Christmas and New Year's season, when the Carl Rosa Company played for three weeks in an excellently varied repertory. Its orchestra was forty to forty-five strong, many of its principals of thoroughly high standard, and generally speaking well able to advance interest in opera. The highest-priced seats were always well filled, sometimes crowded. 'The Magic Flute' and 'Tales of Hoffmann' filled the house, and large numbers of serial tickets were sold at subscription rates. The last three similar holiday periods have witnessed a steady growth in the public's appreciation, for the winter provision of amusement cannot be on as lavish a scale as in summertime, so there is evidently a determination to make the most of opera when it does come. It would seem reasonable to argue that if these people willingly paid on a 5s. basis for Carl Rosa performances they would stretch a bit and pay 7s. or 7s. 6d. for opera such as 'Die Meistersinger,' 'Tristan,' 'Der Rosenkavalier,' given as satisfactorily as was the case under either Denhof or Beecham during the last two tours. I am not speaking in any way derogatorily of the Carl Rosa work (far from it) in saying that the other companies' work is well worth the extra cost, and after all it is value received that counts most with the public. The intervals are most enjoyably spent in a beautifully appointed foyer, and dinner or any other meal can be obtained twenty yards away from the stalls door without leaving the building (which was far from the case at Manchester last November).

Thanks largely to the educational policy steadily pursued in recent years at the Blackpool Festival there appears to be a substantial nucleus of opera-lovers on the spot, capable of reinforcement by crowds of visitors. This factor, and the worthy policy adopted by Mr. van Noorden and Mr. Eugene Goossens in stimulating this opera-going tendency by a list of works calculated to interest all degrees of musical appreciation, cause Blackpool to be regarded as probably the likeliest place in Lancashire at any rate for a trial of the big Wagner and Strauss operas. The results could not well be worse than at Manchester or Liverpool, and I have advanced reasons for thinking they might easily be much better, if such periods as Eastertide, the end of September, or Christmas and the New Year were chosen.

The Carl Rosa Company numbered 150, and tested by the standard attained in 'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin,' 'The Magic Flute,' and 'Jewels of the Madonna,' the results were enjoyable. If the band could have been considerably enlarged and limited to those who habitually played with the Company, good impressions would have been intensified. In Beatrice Miranda, Ina Hill, Wegener, Winckworth, and Hebden Foster, there is a group of singers satisfactory in both a vocal and histrionic sense. Wolf-Ferrari's opera was done in uncommonly good style. The conducting was shared by Messrs. Goossens and van Noorden.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

Edward German's 'Tom Jones' was performed by students of the Guildhall School of Music on December 18, 19 and 20 (matinée), in a way that testified to the vitality and efficiency of the operatic instruction provided by the School. In a long cast the most conspicuous were Miss Dorothy Waring (Sophia), Miss Nellie Walker (Honour), Miss Marjorie Ayling (Lady Bellaston), Mr. Reginald Herbert (Tom Jones), Mr. Vivian Bond (Partridge), Mr. Bevington Rosse (Squire Western), and Mr. Alfred Steed (Blifil). The stage-manager was Mr. Cairns James, and the work of conducting was shared by Mr. Landon Ronald and Mr. Hubert Bath.

London Concerts.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The first concert of the year took place at Queen's Hall on January 20, with the following programme:

Overture to 'The Magic Flute'	Mozart.
Tone-poems ('On hearing the first cuckoo in spring. 'Summer night on the river.')	F. Delius.
Pianoforte concerto in C minor	Rachmaninov.
Symphony No. 7, in A	Beethoven.

It had been announced that Miss Muriel Foster would sing Max Bruch's 'Aus der Tiefe des Grames,' but unfortunately illness prevented her from attending. Miss Foster was recently made the thirtieth recipient of the Philharmonic Society's Gold medal.

It is long since we have heard an important new work from the pen of Frederick Delius, and it cannot be said that the spell is yet broken. Neither of these tone-poems, in spite of their great charm, could be described as important. They are small, both in design and character, but within their range they are completely successful. Their delicate tone-painting and subtle, shifting orchestral and harmonic colours reveal the hand of a master at every point. The unoffending music of Rachmaninov served to indicate rather than to display the pianist's great gifts. The strongest feature of the concert was Herr Mengelberg's reading of the Symphony, which had great rhythmic vitality, and many small points of individual interpretation that were acceptable.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

The great sensation of January 17, when Arnold Schönberg's famous 'Five orchestral pieces' were played under the composer's direction, drew an immense audience to Queen's Hall. The request in the programme for silence during the performance was observed by all but a few, and there was a considerable amount of applause. A consideration of the music, by Mr. Ernest Newman, is given on p. 87. The remainder of the programme consisted of Brahms's 'Tragic' Overture, Haydn's Symphony No. 7, in C major ('Le midi'), Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte concerto in B flat minor, brightly played by Miss Adela Verne, and Charpentier's 'Napoli,' from 'Impressions d'Italie.' On returning to the platform to conduct the last-named item, which followed the work of Schönberg, Sir Henry Wood received a great ovation. It must be added that the orchestra played with wonderful delicacy and responsiveness in the new music.

The annual New-Year's Day concert was given under Sir Henry Wood's direction, before a large audience, drawn by the promise of Beethoven's fifth Symphony, the 'Tannhäuser' Overture and Venusberg music, Liszt's second 'Hungarian Rhapsody,' other orchestral works, and the singing of Miss Phyllis Lett.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The second Carol Concert of this Society was again a popular success, for a large audience attended at the Royal Albert Hall, and much enthusiasm was shown. Among the older examples chosen were 'In dulci jubilo,' 'God rest you merry, gentlemen,' 'Good King Wenceslas,' and 'The first Nowell.' Sir Frederick Bridge's happy knack of carol-writing was exemplified by 'Ring out with jocund chime,' a setting of Mr. Wardle's Christmas carol in 'The Pickwick Papers,' and other pieces. Miss Ruth Vincent, Miss Mary Leighton, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Julien Henry were the soloists, Mr. H. L. Balfour was at the organ, and Sir Frederick Bridge conducted.

On New-Year's Day the customary performance of 'The Messiah' was given in the presence of a large audience. Miss Agnes Nicholls, Madame Kirkby Lunn, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. David Evans were the soloists.

An interesting Carol Concert was given at Westminster Cathedral Hall on December 16, by the Cathedral Choir, under the direction of Dr. R. R. Terry. The programme included examples by Hans Sachs, Du Caurroy, Merbecke, Dering, Byrd, Palestrina, Di Lasso, Jacob Handl, Praetorius, together with a number of MS. Latin carols collected by the Rev. G. R. Woodward. Modern carols by Gustav von Holst and Hubert Bath were given under the direction of the composers.

A 'Private Concert' was given by the Bach Choir at the Royal College of Music on December 18, under the direction of Dr. H. P. Allen. The programme, which was entirely British, was worthy of less private exploitation, for it consisted of Sir Charles Stanford's 'Stabat Mater,' Sir Hubert Parry's 'Ode on the Nativity' (given for the first time in London), and Dr. Vaughan Williams's 'Five mystical songs,' sung by Mr. J. Campbell McInnes. Both of the choral works were interpreted with great effectiveness, which accentuated the feeling of regret that they have been so much neglected by choral Societies. The other soloists of the concert were Miss Katherine Vincent, Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. Francis Buckley, and Mr. Plunket Greene. The London Symphony Orchestra was employed.

Trinity College of Music gave an Orchestral Concert at Queen's Hall on December 20 before a large audience, who showed every sign of gratification. The first movement from Schumann's Symphony in B flat was well played under Mr. Wilhelm Sachse's direction, and creditable performances of solo works were given by students of the pianoforte, violin, and singing. Mr. Donald J. Priestley showed high capacity as an organist, and a Pianoforte concerto by a student, Edric Greiffenhagen, played by Mr. Edward S. Mitchell, showed considerable creative fluency.

Music appropriate to the Christmas season was chosen for the concert of the Oriana Madrigal Society at the Duke's Hall on December 21. Choral Fantasias by Mr. G. von Holst and Dr. Vaughan Williams on carol tunes, and Mr. B. J. Dale's Christmas hymn, 'Before the paling of the stars,' were the chief numbers in a programme that included folk-carols, motets, and other smaller works. Mr. Frederic Austin sang his own arrangement of 'The twelve days of Christmas,' and many other soloists assisted.

Mr. B. J. Dale supplied organ accompaniments, and Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott conducted.

A notable performance of 'The Messiah' was given by the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society, on January 3, under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill. The choral singing was of the character that has won for the Society its high reputation. The solo parts were taken by Miss Gladys Moger, Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Robert Radford.

The concert-version of Gounod's 'Faust' was excellently performed by the Central London Choral and Orchestral Society at Queen's Hall on January 15, under the direction of Mr. David J. Thomas. The solo parts were ably taken by Miss Carrie Tubbs, Miss Lilian Tooley, Mr. Samuel Masters, Mr. Ceredig Walters, and Mr. Humphrey Bishop.

The programme of the Société des Concerts Français, at Bechstein Hall on January 16, was as usual one of exceptional character. It was interesting to hear Ravel's familiar String quartet interpreted by the composer's fellow-countrymen—the Parisian String Quartet—for there were undoubtedly more nuance and atmosphere in the performance than the average British quartet-party achieves. The singer of the occasion was Madame Leininger-Davies.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Classical Concert Society brought its autumn season to an end at Bechstein Hall on December 17, when great interest was aroused by the inclusion of several of M. Maurice Ravel's works in the programme and by M. Ravel's presence as pianist and conductor. His String quartet in F, and 'Introduction and Allegro' for harp, flute, clarinet, and strings, earned their customary favour, the latter proving especially attractive under the composer's conductorship. M. Ravel, in playing the accompaniments to a selection of his songs, showed how greatly tone-gradation and tone-value can enhance their effectiveness. The singer was Miss Rhoda von Glehn, and the instrumentalists included the English String Quartet and Miss Gwendolen Mason (harp). Pianoforte works of Scriabine were played by Mr. F. S. Kelly.

On December 18, M. Ravel was entertained at the Grafton Galleries by the Music Club. The 'Introduction and Allegro' were again performed, and songs were given by Mlle. Hélène Luquiens.

SCHÖNBERG'S SEXTET.

The Sextet of Schönberg (Op. 4) has been played twice recently, once at the meeting of the Music Club on January 15, at the Grafton Gallery, and once at the concert of the London String Quartet, at Bechstein Hall, on January 23, and on both occasions it was played by the London String Quartet (Mr. A. E. Sammons, Mr. Thomas W. Petre, Mr. H. Waldo Warner, and Mr. C. Warwick Evans), with Mr. James Lockyer (2nd viola) and Mr. Cedric Sharpe (2nd violoncello).

The Sextet is avowedly programme-music. It has the title 'Verklärte Nacht' ('Transfigured night'), and is based on a poem by Richard Dehmel, one of the foremost poets of the German school of intellectual revolt. It tells how a man forgives the grievous sin of a woman who loves him, and how, by his act of self-abnegation, the world seems transfigured. The music does not follow the text closely, though it needs little imagination to hear the two voices and to separate what may be called the dramatic elements from those which are 'atmospheric,' and depict first the cold, hard world, and then the world transfigured. It is written in one movement, and is based on leading themes which recur throughout. It is a work of great beauty, and rare expressive power. Its form, though free, appeals by its logical consistency. It is harmonically rich, and the use of the instruments is remarkably able. The volume of tone is almost orchestral, but one never feels that the composer is striving to get beyond the natural limitations of the medium he has chosen. The whole is inspired by a rarely sensitive poetical imagination.

The Sextet does not explain the later developments of Schönberg: it makes them the harder to understand.

The performance on both occasions was admirable, eliciting the warm praise of the composer, who was present on the first occasion.

RECITALS.

Herr Egon Petri made the most of his brilliant executive powers as a pianist at Bechstein Hall on December 18, Brahms's 'Paganini' Variations being a prominent feature of the programme.

Misses Valerie and Eulalia Hillyard-Swinstead (mezzo-soprano and soprano) and Miss Erica Green (elocutionist) gave a pleasant recital at Bechstein Hall on December 21.

Mlle. Tina Lerner chose a programme of Liszt's works for her recital at Æolian Hall on January 13, and played them with great brilliance and notable insight.

Mr. Herbert Fryer gave a 'farewell' recital (on the eve of an American tour) at Æolian Hall, on January 12, and appeared both as pianist and composer. The programme was further varied with Dohnányi's Violin and pianoforte sonata in C sharp minor, in which Madame Beatrice Langley was the violinist.

A programme consisting mainly of Russian songs was given by Madame Anna Jerebtzova, a singer of high ability, at Bechstein Hall on January 14.

At Steinway Hall on January 14, Messrs. George and Bewlay Cathie played Violin and Pianoforte sonatas by Arthur Hinton (in B flat) and Brahms (in A), and Mr. George Uttley (baritone) gave songs.

Miss Muriel Davenport played Schumann's Sonata in G minor and César Franck's 'Prelude, Aria and Finale' at Æolian Hall on January 15.

On January 20, Madame Gardner-Bartlett, an able singer from America, gave a recital at Steinway Hall. On the following day Miss Jessie Brett Young (soprano) earned great favour with her singing at Bechstein Hall.

BOURNEMOUTH.

The first half of the winter season has revealed no falling away in the support or interest of the concert-going public; steady and consistent patronage, with little or no variation, seems to be the good fortune of the municipality's musical activities.

Beyond all else, the outstanding event of the month just past was the production at the eleventh Symphony Concert of Sibelius's Symphony No. 4, in A minor, a work which has not been heard in England since the initial performance, under the composer's direction, at a recent Birmingham Festival. Mr. Dan Godfrey had evidently bestowed an immense amount of care upon its preparation, and the orchestral playing was splendid; but although the audience applauded the performance in generous measure, it is not likely that the composition will benefit by many performances in this country. We have enjoyed performances of such pleasing works as Dvorák's stirring 'Husitska' Overture; Stanford's melodious 'Irish' Symphony; Glazounov's Symphonic-poem 'Stenka Razine,' one of the Russian musician's best works; Beethoven's C minor Symphony; the Overture to 'Die Meistersinger'; and the Symphony of César Franck. The soloists have been Miss Tosta di Benici (pianoforte), Miss Leila Doubleday (violin), Mr. Arnold Trowell (violoncello), and Miss Marjorie Dorning (violin). Eclecticism has been the keynote of the Monday 'Pops,' as reference to the chief details of the concerts will show: December 15: 'International' Programme—Overture, 'Le Carneval Romain,' by Berlioz; 'Bavarian Dances,' by Elgar; Overture 'Leonore,' No. 3, by Beethoven; Suite No. 1, 'Peer Gynt,' by Grieg; 'Scènes Caucasiennes,' by Ippolitov-Ivanov. December 22: 'Christmastide' Programme—Overture, 'The Cricket on the Hearth,' by A. C. Mackenzie; 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance,' by Balfour Gardiner; Tone-poem, 'Christmas Eve,' by Southey Frost, a local composer; Trio for two flutes and harp, from 'L'Enfance du Christ,' by Berlioz, capably played by Messrs. Jean and Pierre Gennin and Miss Jacoba Wolters, members of the Orchestra; Variations on the Austrian Hymn, by Haydn; Meditation 'Lux Christi,' by Elgar; Suite, 'Where the rainbow ends,' by Roger Quilter, first performance at these concerts; and the two versions of the 'Ave Maria' of Max Bruch and Bach-Gounod—the former for the first time at these concerts—well sung by Miss Nora Read, Bournemouth's popular soprano. December 29: 'Tchaikovsky' Programme—Overture, 'Romeo and Juliet'; 'Casse Noisette' Suite. January 5: 'Grieg' Programme—'Holberg' Suite for strings; Old Norwegian Romance. At one of these concerts some duets for two pianofortes were played with striking success by Miss Craigie Ross, a favourite local performer, and Mrs. Farnell-Watson.

A number of recitals and special concerts has added to the interest during the month. That brilliant young pianist, Mr. Benno Moiseiwitsch, has exhibited his gifts in no uncertain manner; Miss Ellen Terry's discourse on 'Some of the Heroines of Shakespeare's Plays' was followed with attentive approval; Kerekjarto, an unusually talented boy violinist, and Miss Rosina Buckman, soprano, provided an enjoyable afternoon's entertainment; a visit by Casals, whereat the great 'cellist delighted his hearers to the full in Dvorák's beautiful Concerto and some shorter works, was a red-letter day for the town; and on January 14 a Wagner concert, with Miss Carrie Tubb and Mr. Thorpe Bates as the capable soloists, proved, on the whole, a successful function; finally, a two-days' engagement of the Russian Ballet was not without its good points, although no new features have been added to the repertoire of this organization.

BRISTOL.

Owing to the large attendances at the organ recitals held monthly at the church of St. Mary Redcliffe, it has been decided to continue the recitals during the present year. On January 7 Mr. R. T. Morgan (organist of the church) was at the instrument, and he was associated with Mr. Hubert Hunt (organist of the Cathedral) who is an accomplished player on the violin, several compositions for organ and violin being in the programme. On February 4 the recital will be given by Mr. Charles W. Steer (organist of St. Mary's, Tyndall's Park).

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

There is always a lull in matters musical just before and during the Christmas holidays, and even in the month of January, so that very few events of any note have to be recorded. The third visit here of Madame Julia Culp, the excellent Lieder singer, in connection with the Max Mossel Drawing-room Concerts, which took place at the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on December 17, 1913, was as usual an artistic event, the singer being supported by Herr Egon Petri, the well-known pianist, and Herr Coenraad v. Bos, accompanist. The annual Yuletide performance of Handel's 'Messiah,' by the Birmingham Festival Choral Society on Boxing Night, attracted an enormous audience to the Town Hall, and those present had the privilege of hearing a performance on Festival lines, quite remarkable in grandeur of tone, sincerity of expression and phrasing, on the part of the excellently constituted choir. The cast of principals was an unusually strong one, comprising Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Hamilton Harris, the duties of organist again falling to Mr. C. W. Perkins. Dr. Sinclair, who conducted, is to be congratulated on so splendid a reading of the 'Messiah.' The terminal concert of the Midland Institute School of Music was held at the large theatre of that Institute on December 15, the executive being the Students' Orchestra conducted by Prof. Granville Bantock. An attractive and well-executed programme was submitted, comprising several novelties, special success being achieved with Gustav von Holst's Oriental Suite, 'Beni Mora,' conducted by the composer. Another interesting feature was the performance of Bach's Concerto for four pianofortes, by pupils of Mr. Arthur Cooke.

The Birmingham Amateur Opera Society once more provided the musical entertainment in connection with the Midland Institute annual conversazione, held at the Town Hall and Midland Institute, January 13, 14, 15, 16. The choice fell this year on Basil Hood and Edward German's comic opera 'A Princess of Kensington' (originally produced at the Savoy, January, 1903), conducted by Mr. Franklyn Mountford. The long cast of principals was in able hands, the chief honours falling to Mrs. C. O. Whitfield and Miss Edith Ryland.

The Ladies' Night of the Bristol Madrigal Society was held on January 8 at the Victoria Rooms, and as in former years the concert was highly successful, there being a large and appreciative audience. The choir numbered 108, and Mr. D. W. Rootham conducted, this being the forty-ninth occasion upon which he has directed the performances of the Society upon a Ladies' Night. Among the compositions which had not before been given by the members was Pearsall's 'Shoot, false love, I care not.' Its attractive qualities afforded much gratification. Dr. Cyril B. Rootham (son of the conductor), once a singing-member of the Bristol Society, composed a piece specially for it, 'Follow your saint' (words of Robert Campion, an Elizabethan poet). The pleasing character of the contribution was recognised by the hearers, and the hearty applause which followed led to a repetition. Another encore was accorded to Sir Hubert Parry's 'Since thou, O fondest and truest,' an admirable setting of a poem by the Poet Laureate. Among the madrigals which the Society gave for the first time was Morley's 'What ails my darling?' Pearsall's 'In dulci jubilo,' which had not been included in the Society's programme for five years, was as usual re-demanded, and another production obtaining this mark of favour was W. Beale's 'This pleasant month of Maie.' Altogether the performance may rank with the best in the Society's records. Among those who attended the concert were Sir Edward Cooper (ex-president of the Madrigal Society, London, and present chairman of the Royal Academy of Music), Dr. Basil Harwood, and Dr. Cyril B. Rootham (Cambridge).

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

A clever cantata setting of 'The Jackdaw of Rheims,' by George Fox, was excellently sung on December 18 by the Glee Club of Plymouth College, conducted by Herr Kühne, assisted by a small orchestra formed almost exclusively of O.P.M. members. The Club was in better voice and balance than has been the case for a long time.

Plymouth Guildhall Choir gave their annual performance of 'The Messiah' on January 10, conducted by Mr. H. Moreton, with a band, and Misses Lilian Dillingham and Edith Leitch, and Messrs. Alfred Heather and Bridge Peters as principals. The choir of Union Chapel, Plymouth, sang the cantata 'The Shepherd of souls' on January 14, and an organ recital was given by Mr. Ernest Ackland.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

On December 29, 1913, Barnstaple Musical Festival Society, conducted by Dr. H. J. Edwards, with a band led by Mr. Percy Parish, performed 'The Messiah,' the principal soloists being the Misses Winifred Thomas, Eva Pickard, Messrs. Sydney Harper (sen. and jun.), C. J. Bath, and J. M. Northcote, and Dr. S. R. Gibbs.

That the fortnightly concerts given by Barnstaple Municipal Orchestral Society have taken hold of the public is proved by the encouraging support given. The programme of popular music played on January 3, under the direction of Mr. A. Hind, was well received. Torquay Municipal Orchestra continues to supply varied kinds of high-class music, and it is gratifying to note that the Symphony and Classical Concerts are best supported. An interesting recital of music for two pianofortes was given on January 10, by Messrs. Edgar Heap and Ernest Goss.

Exeter Male Choir, conducted by Mr. F. Pinn, sang pieces by S. Webbe, Oakeley, Reichardt, Mackenzie, Cantor, and Sullivan on January 16, and vocal solos were sung by Mr. John Hare. Duets for two pianofortes were played by Mrs. H. Hare and Miss Hare, and violoncello solos were given by Miss May Bartlett. Mr. S. W. Alfred Moyle, violoncellist, and Miss Fifi de la Côte, soprano, gave recitals at Exeter on January 19. The Westminster Glee Singers contributed to the programme.

CORNWALL.

New-Year's Night was the occasion of a concert at which Phillack Church choir sang part-songs under the direction of Mrs. A. Pendarves Hockin, and also of a performance of 'From Manger to Cross,' by Looe Wesleyan Choir, directed by Mr. T. H. Northam. The Cantata 'The Saviour of Men' was excellently sung by Calstock Wesleyan Choir, also on New-Year's Day, Mr. Hedley Bickle conducting; and High Lanes Wesleyan Choir held an interesting anthem service.

The twelfth concert of Penzance Orchestral Society on December 15 included a 'centenary' performance of Beethoven's No. 7 Symphony, which did credit to the player, and to Mr. Walter Barnes, conductor. Soloists were Miss Winifred Blight, violoncello, Mr. C. L. Taylor, oboe, and Mr. Ernest White, baritone.

DUBLIN.

The Royal Dublin Society chamber music recitals re-commenced on January 5 with the English String Quartet, whose programme included works by Schumann (in A major), Ravel, and Haydn.

M. Edouard Risler gave a pianoforte recital on January 12, playing Beethoven's Sonata Op. 57, Schubert's Op. 78, and a group of pieces by Fauré, Debussy, Saint-Saëns, and Liszt.

On January 19 the Brodsky Quartet played Schubert's Quartet in G minor (posthumous), Beethoven's Op. 131, and Schumann's Op. 41, No. 1.

The Woodbrook Concerts re-opened on January 10 with a vocal recital by Mr. John Coates, who sang magnificently a very interesting selection of English, French, and German songs. Mr. Hamilton Harty was at the pianoforte and Mr. Clyde Twelvrees played some violoncello solos.

On January 17 the programme included Trios by Arensky, Beethoven (Op. 70, No. 2), and songs by Madame Nora Borel. Signor Simonetti played Saint-Saëns's 'Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso.'

On January 20, Miss Madalene Mooney (recently returned to Dublin from Dresden) gave a violin recital assisted by Miss Jean Nolan, a talented local mezzo-soprano.

The syllabus for Feis Ceoil (May 4 to 9) has just been published. The adjudicators include Mr. Allen Gill (choirs), Mr. E. Gordon Cleather and Mr. Charles Victor (vocal solos), Mr. Frederick Dawson (pianoforte), Mr. Rawdon Briggs (strings), and Lieut. J. Ord Hume (bands).

EDINBURGH.

The musical event of the greatest importance since our last review was the series of three orchestral concerts of Brahms's works, conducted by Steinbach, on December 22, 26, and 29. The outstanding items were Huberman's interpretation of the Violin concerto, Mr. Leonard Borwick's brilliant conception of the second Pianoforte concerto, and the 'Song of Destiny' as sung by Mr. Kirkhope's Choir. Undoubtedly Brahms's works under Steinbach's baton were anything but enigmatical.

Strauss's 'Don Quixote' received its first performance at Edinburgh at the ninth concert of the series on January 12.

On December 24, Mr. Mooney's Choir gave their annual performance of 'The Messiah' with great success, and Herr Feuerberg made his début as conductor of the Royal Choral Union in the same work on January 1.

The Sixth Classical Concert, on January 13, was devoted chiefly to chamber music. In addition to Quartets by Mozart and Chausson, Saint-Saëns's Septet in E flat was given, and two groups of songs by Beethoven and Brahms were interpreted by Paul Draper, an American tenor. The Septet (in which the trumpet is employed) found great favour. The Willaume Quartet Party left nothing to be desired in the instrumental selections.

GLASGOW.

The last two Classical Concerts of 1913 were notable as introducing to a Glasgow audience two remarkably fine solo performers, viz., Mr. Bronislaw Huberman, violinist, on December 23, and Miss Tina Lerner, pianist, on December 30. The former gave an intensely powerful interpretation of Brahms's Violin concerto, and the latter an equally striking performance of Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte concerto No. 1, in B flat minor. At these concerts Delius's impressionist 'In a summer garden' and Max Reger's 'Concerto in the olden style' for orchestra were brought to a first hearing here. The Choral Union gave their time-honoured 'Messiah' concert on New-Year's Day (repeated to a 'Popular' audience a fortnight later), and two other praiseworthy performances of Handel's immortal work deserve special notice. The first is that of the Springburn Choral Union (Mr. B. W. Hartley, conductor), a recently-formed suburban choir, which took place on Christmas Eve. The choruses were sung with capital effect, and altogether the new choir, which possesses an unusually good tenor section, promises very well indeed. An efficient quartet gave the solo music, and Mr. Cole's band, skilfully supported by Mr. G. T. Pattman at the organ, played the accompaniments. The feature of the second 'Messiah' performance (the Young Men's Christian Association Choir, under Mr. R. L. Reid) was the members' familiarity with their music, which enabled them to sing with a freedom and vigour altogether refreshing. Mr. Cole's band, and Mr. W. J. Clapperton as organist, gave the accompaniments.

The tenth Classical Concert, on January 6, took the form of a Brahms evening, the programme including the third Symphony, the Academic Festival Overture, and Variations for orchestra on a theme by Haydn; Miss Doris Woodall's charming singing of nine songs completed a most interesting evening's music. The programme of the eleventh concert, on January 13, offered a study in contrasts: Richard Strauss's 'Don Quixote' (given for the first time here), Mozart's 'Don Giovanni' Overture, and a selection from Schubert's 'Rosamunde.' Strauss's remarkable work was excellently interpreted by the Scottish Orchestra (Mr. W. Sasbach, solo violoncellist), under M. Mlynarski, a consideration which doubtless determined the volume of the applause. The Saturday Popular Orchestral Concerts continue to be well supported, and so far the high-water mark in point of attendance and enthusiasm was reached on January 10, when M. Sapelnikoff appeared as solo pianist. He played Chopin's Concerto No. 1, in E minor, but it was in his group of solos that he achieved his greatest triumph.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The Christmas season was celebrated by three notable performances of the 'Messiah,' by the Philharmonic Society, the Welsh Choral Union, and the Liverpool Choral Society. Conducted by Sir Frederic Cowen, the premier Society's performance was chiefly characterized by the beauty and finish of the orchestral playing. Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Doris Woodall, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Frederick Randalow (who sang the bass music extremely well), formed the vocal cast. Conducted by Mr. Harry Evans the performance given by the Welsh Choral Union is considered to be the finest yet to their credit in this particular work. The most notable features were splendid weight of tone and fiery attack. There was an adequate quartet of vocal principals in Miss Emily Breare, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. John Watkyn, and Mr. Herbert Brown. Mr. Akeroyd led the orchestra. The Liverpool Choral Society's 'Messiah' in the Central Hall, under Mr. Percival Ingram, followed safe and traditional lines and was a generally acceptable performance. The soloists were Madame Parkes Derby, Miss Dorothy Ledsome, Mr. Albert Holt, and Mr. Charles Leeds. Mr. Coller was at the organ.

At the seventh Philharmonic Concert, on January 13, Mr. Max Fiedler (the eminent German conductor, of Boston Symphony Orchestra fame) sustained his reputation as an interpreter of Brahms's music in an illuminating performance of the master's noble stately Symphony. A novelty was provided in Scheinflug's 'Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare.' Señor Pablo Casals, who is an established favourite at these concerts, played very finely in Saint-Saëns's Violoncello concerto, Op. 33, that most interesting example of modern violoncello music, and was also heard in Glazounov's 'Chant du Ménestrel' and a Rondo by Dvorák, to which the pianoforte accompaniments were cleverly played by Miss Helena McCullagh. The vocalist was Signor Ventura, whose mellifluous tenor voice and well-simulated intensity of style found favour. The choir had a holiday on this evening.

Elgar's 'Falstaff' is to have its first hearing at Liverpool at the Philharmonic Concert on March 10, which Mr. Landon Ronald will conduct.

At the sixth concert of the Rodewald Club, on January 12, an interesting programme was sustained by Miss Margaret Balfour (vocalist), and two clever pianists, Miss Una Truman and Miss Irene Truman, who together played Max Bruch's Phantasie in D minor for two pianofortes, three Silhouettes by Arensky, and Saint-Saëns's 'Caprice Arabe.'

The Moody-Manners Opera Company commenced a six weeks' season in Kelly's Theatre on January 5, and have been heard in well-known operas, which have attracted and pleased crowded audiences nightly. Mr. Charles Manners has amply proved the wisdom of his policy in offering the public popular operas at popular prices, and as regards the performances there was much to commend. Mr. Manners has gathered round him an excellent company, which he occasionally supplements by artists of the eminence of Miss Zélie de Lussan and Mr. Philip Brozel. The conductor is Mr. Hans Winter, and a feature of the competent, if comparatively small, orchestra is the inclusion of lady string-players.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The resumption of the season's programme has accentuated the fact that orchestral music is becoming less and less the cult of the few and rapidly finding its way to the great heart of the people. The lowest price of admission to the Hallé concerts is not greater than that of the more popular Saturday night programmes, but the attendances in other parts of the hall on Saturday are in vivid contrast to the somewhat meagre support accorded such ventures twelve or fifteen years ago. The first Municipal concert to which I alluded last month did not pack the fine Town Hall chamber, which only confirmed the views I expressed as to the unwise methods adopted in the disposal of tickets. At Manchester there are probably a score of well-organized agencies for social amelioration and advancement, who would have been only too glad to lend their aid in securing an attendance from precisely those quarters which the well-meant City Council's efforts entirely failed to reach.

As Manchester is also seeking to arouse more interest in the summer-time band performances in her parks, municipal advancement of musical culture may be said to be slowly and (we all hope) surely progressing. Two or three years ago in the adjoining Royal borough of Salford its Town Council had to make good a deficiency of something like £60 on a winter's working of concerts, incurred mainly through the engagement of an orchestra on several occasions when the Municipal Choral Society gave oratorios. The authorities then decided that the dozen concerts per season must be self-supporting! How absurd is such a demand when their best hall holding fewer than 1,000 people only enables receipts of £15 per night. In the matter of provision of decent music for the masses at popular prices of 2d., 3d., or 6d., many of the fine spacious mission halls in all our large industrial centres identified with the various Free Churches of Nonconformity are doing much more than many municipalities. Throughout the North Country there must be thousands of working-folk who gained their first acquaintance with music better than the public-house or street-organ or music-hall ditty can provide, through some such agency. Hundreds of them will never get any further, but hundreds more will discover an appetite for better and better music, and will pass onward and upward via unpretentious park performances to popular choral and orchestral concerts. On some such foundation as this and the good work in our midst of the competitive festival movement the cheaper popular 'promenade' concert promoters are building, and they in their turn will feed the highest class of symphony concert and opera—not all at once, but this roughly represents the evolution during a generation or two.

It is announced that the Brand Lane Choir, which has been mainly concerned with Handel and Mendelssohnian Oratorio, is to prepare 'Gerontius' next season, for performance under Sir Henry Wood. 'Gerontius' and 'Omar' are the two choral works which will draw a crowd at Manchester.

The Gentlemen's Concerts, under the Balling régime, have explored the highways and hedges of the 18th century orchestral music. Much of it has been distinctly enjoyable, and possibly more severe in aspect than the piquant programmes of Sir Henry Wood; but can cultured amateurs of to-day get up any enthusiasm for such manneristic artifice as Dittersdorf's symphonies?

At the first Hallé concert after the recess, the 'Pathetic' Symphony drew a good audience. Maurice Ravel's 'Mother Goose' Suite alternately tickled, annoyed, and bored many in the audience. To me it seemed to be the ideal musical embodiment of the Aubrey Beardsley-Nielsen-Rackham spirit of fancifulness—every detail wrought so exquisitely, but its greatest distinction lying in the perfectly spontaneous play of the composer's imagination. Further it served to show more clearly than any previous occasion the great advance made, under Balling's guidance, in the Orchestra's adaptability to work of this kind, formerly quite outside its scope.

On January 15 Gustav von Holst's 'Beni Mora' Suite was introduced at the Hallé concert, although some of us had made its earlier acquaintance at the Musical League Festival at Birmingham twelve months ago. Impressions then formed of its felicitous blend of the gaiety of Algerian street life with the brooding mystery of the desert were more than confirmed. The imaginative appeal is not gained so much by a contrast of these moods as by the subtler simultaneity of impression which is experienced in a more or less subconscious way; unusual as are such means, they successfully convey the composer's message, and its reception was frankly cordial.

French chamber music has latterly come into greater favour, despite the somewhat lukewarm attitude towards it a few years ago when the Société des Concerts Français gave a series here. At the Bowdon concerts the Williamite Quartet gave us the ideal interpretation of the Debussy G minor, excelling even the Brussels performance. Such viola-playing has not been heard here for many a day. The Chausson Pianoforte quartet was in the same noble Franckian vein as the Violin tone-poem heard earlier in the winter; Madame Feuillard was the pianist. A week later Mr. Frederick Dawson, an avowed champion of the modern French school of pianism, joined members of the Brodsky Quartet in Faure's Quartet.

Korngold's new G major Violin sonata received its first English performance on January 19 by Messrs. Isidor Cohn and Arthur Catterall, whose interpretation, it is said, has received the composer's sanction. So ambitious a work of chamber-music does not often come our way, and the size and enthusiasm of the audience must be gratifying to all concerned. It has been well said that the progress of genius is a miracle at every step, and the Scherzo and final movement of this Sonata seem to mark the highest point yet achieved by young Korngold; there was no doubt as to the audience's views upon these two sections of the work, which, I may add, plays forty minutes.

Mr. Charles H. Fogg has now allied the forces of his Altrincham Amateur Orchestra with the more recently established Crumpsall Male Chorus for occasional joint performances. Mendelssohn's 'To the sons of Art' and Stanford's 'Sea-songs' (with Mr. C. H. Blackmore as soloist) afforded admirable material for such joint performance.

The Manchester Orpheus Glee Society is preparing to organize itself as a propagandist force in the interests of Manchester musical life. In association with many men of artistic note at Manchester, it is intended to help along fresh musical developments as they arise, particularly in the way of a municipal advance in the appreciation of all branches of art. An endeavour is also to be made to secure greater unity of effort amongst the city's musical organizations.

The work of the Manchester School of Music was exhibited at the Houldsworth Hall, on December 19, in an orchestral concert given under the direction of the Principal, Mr. Albert J. Cross. The programme included Concerto movements and other solo pieces played by Miss Irene Cánepa and Miss Mary Palmer (violinists), Miss Emily Williamson and Miss Dora Grosse (pianists), songs from Miss Rita Copland, Miss Alice Shawcross, and Miss Dora Lunt. The 'Meistersinger' and 'Il Seraglio' Overtures were among the orchestral works.

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

The thirty-fifth concert of the Classical Concert Society was given in the Westgate Assembly Rooms, Newcastle, on January 12, with a programme by Mr. Herbert Withers (violin-cello), Mrs. Herbert Withers (pianoforte), Fraülein Meta Diestel (vocalist), and Miss Margaret Dencke (accompanist). Mr. and Mrs. Withers played Strauss's early Sonata in F major, and a rather sombre Sonata in one movement, by Jean Hure. The next concert is fixed for February 19, when the Parisian Quartet and Florent Schmitt will provide the programme, and will play among other things the latter's fine Quintet.

Messrs. Hoggett, of Darlington, gave a concert in the Mechanics' Hall, on Wednesday, January 14, when an excellent programme was provided by Miss Ivanoff (a young Russian soprano), Mr. Lloyd Powell (pianist), M. Zacharewitsch (violinist), and Mr. Charles Tree. An original contribution to the programme was a Violin- and song-cycle by M. Zacharewitsch, entitled 'The songs of the awakening,' based on the 'Rubáiyát of Omar Kháyyam.' The violin had by far the more important part, and the frequent use of vocalisation without words was more novel than convincing. It left one wondering whether the composer had really caught the mystical meaning of this strangely haunting poem.

YORKSHIRE.

Since the usual eruption of 'Messiah' performances at Christmastide there has been little doing in the way of serious music. On January 10, at the Leeds Saturday Orchestral Concert, Miss Daisy Kennedy made her first public appearance at Leeds and created a most favourable impression by her highly artistic playing of the solo part in Mozart's Violin concerto in D (Köchel No. 218). Mr. Fricker also gave an excellent performance of Schumann's 'Overture, Scherzo, and Finale,' and did justice to the subtleties of Debussy's Prelude to 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune,' to Liszt's 'Orpheus,' and to Tchaikovsky's 'Capriccio Italien.'

Another very accomplished violinist, M. Anton Maaskoff, appeared at the Leeds Musical Evening on January 13, and gave a very interesting recital, playing Bach's Chaconne and Tartini's 'Trillo del Diavolo' with masterly ease and power, and introducing some effective salon music by Antonio de Grassi. On the following evening Mr. Edward Elliott, a well-known local violinist, along with Mr. Lupton Whitelock, a Leeds flautist, gave a concert at which some uncommon pieces were heard. A String quartet in D minor, by Mr. A. E. Grimshaw, the very gifted Leeds musician whose tragic death occurred only last year, was heard with peculiar interest, and its genuine artistic distinction made his loss seem the more deplorable. A Quintet in E for flute and strings (with two violas), by Kuhlau, a graceful Suite for flute and pian-forte (Mrs. Edward Elliott) by Kronke, Dvorák's String terzetto and Schütt's 'Carneval Mignon,' for pianoforte, were among the pieces that were given. A pianoforte and violoncello recital by Miss Marion Keighley Snowden and Mr. John Keighley Snowden, on January 20, introduced two young but thorough artists to Leeds, and their performance of an exacting and interesting programme was most enjoyable.

The Bradford Subscription Concert, on January 16, was remarkable chiefly for the introduction of Bruckner to the West Riding, his third Symphony, in D minor, being given under Mr. Balling's direction, by the Hallé Orchestra. Despite some weakness, mostly in matters of construction, it is music so full of ideas and so high in aim as to impress one, and it is to be hoped that it may be succeeded by others of the nine which Bruckner left behind him. The Overture, Scherzo, and Nocturne from the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' music was an enjoyable feature of the concert, at which Miss Carrie Tubb was the brilliant and artistic vocalist. At the Bradford Permanent Orchestra' Concert on January 17, Mr. Julian Clifford conducted an excellent performance of the 'Unfinished' Symphony, and Miss Margery Bentwich played with great refinement and piquant expression the solo part of Saint-Saëns's Violin concerto in B minor. On January 19 began the fourth season of the Bradford Free Chamber Concerts, organized by Mr. S. Midgley with the help of a few generous amateurs. The programme included String quartets by Mozart in B flat (Köchel No. 458), Beethoven in E flat (Op. 74), and the Pianoforte quartet by Hurlstone in E minor (Op. 43), which were played by local artists, Messrs. Dunford, Busfield, Thornton, and Drake. Miss Maggie Lister was the vocalist. At the Huddersfield Subscription Concert on January 6, the programme was sustained by six ladies, who more than upheld the honour of their sex by their highly artistic performances. Miss Daisy Kennedy was the violinist; Miss Tina Lerner (whose playing was, within its range, faultless) the pianist; and Miss Carrie Tubb and Miss Lucy Nuttall, the vocalists. Miss Edith McCullagh and Miss Helen Anderton sang duets with a perfect sympathy, the outcome of long co-operation.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERDEEN.—The Bach Society has given evidence of the earnestness and thoroughness of its work by an admirable performance of the 'Christmas Oratorio' in Queen's Cross Church, on December 22. The singing of the choir was of high quality, especially in the chorales. Mr. Warren T. Clemens conducted, and accompaniments were provided at the organ and pianoforte by Mr. Boothroyd and Miss Janet Lorimer. The solo parts were taken by Miss Kate Burt, Miss M. F. Doig, Mr. McCallum, and Mr. Forsyth.

BRAMPTON.—The Musical Society gave a performance of Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George,' on January 8. The solo part was sung by Miss Gladys Peck. In the miscellaneous programme which followed, Miss Peck, Miss Ethel Ingamells, and Mr. Philip Malcolm contributed songs, and the choir gave two selections from van Bree's 'St. Cecilia's Day.' The string orchestra played German's 'Three dances' from 'Henry VIII.' Miss Florence Armstrong presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. B. Scott was the organist. Mr. C. F. Eastwood conducted.

BRIGHTON.—On December 17, a new oratorio, 'St. John,' by Mr. Alfred Vale, was produced at the Dome under the direction of Mr. E. Lyell-Taylor, with Miss Maud Barlow, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Dan Richards as soloists.

CALGARY (CANADA).—The newly formed Calgary Symphony Orchestra gave a matinée in the Sherman Grand Theatre, on November 25, to about 1,700 school-children. The programme included the Overture to 'L'Epreuve Villageoise' (Grétry), the Minuet and Finale from Haydn's 'Military Symphony,' the 'Dances of the hours' (Délibes), 'The Sandman' and 'Evening prayer' from 'Hänsel and Gretel' (Humperdinck), and other suitable numbers. The second Subscription Concert, on December 8, took the form of a Wagner centenary celebration, the Orchestra being assisted by Mr. George Harris (tenor), of New York.

CARLISLE.—Elgar's 'Caractacus' was effectively and successfully performed by the Choral Society on January 15, under the direction of Mr. Darley. The choralsists had brought great enthusiasm to the study of what was to them new music, and gave an interpretation worthy of the fine work. The solo parts were sung by Miss Nellie Judson, Mr. Joseph Reed, Dr. Graham, Mr. Andrew Sharp, and Mr. W. Hale (as Caractacus).

GRIMSBY.—On January 13 the Grimsby Philharmonic Society gave an admirable performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' Parts I. and II. The soloists were Miss Groat, Mr. A. Nicol, and Mr. H. Harris, and Mr. W. Porter conducted. The programme also included a miscellaneous selection.

HANLEY.—The fifth annual concert of the Hanley and District Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Ernest C. Redfern, took place at the Victoria Hall on January 8, when the following excellent programme was given by the choir: Parry's 'Come, pretty wag, and sing,' Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bees,' Brahms's 'The gardener' and 'Cradle-song,' Berlioz's 'Ophelia,' Holbrooke's 'Thro' groves sequestered,' Cornelius's 'I can but love thee,' Bantock's

'The Leprehaun' and 'Hunting song,' and Eaton Fanning's 'The song of the Vikings.' The interpretations given were characterized by their technical beauty and expressive insight. Solos were given by Miss Elsie Hood, Mr. Charles Till, and Mr. David Clegg (organist).

LEATHERHEAD.—At a recent concert held by the Royal School for the Blind the programme included Bridge's 'The Inchcape Rock,' Bateson's 'Two Cupids,' Bantock's 'Evening has lost her throne,' and Stewart's 'The Bells of St. Michael's Tower.'

MILFORD-ON-SEA.—The Choral Society performed Schubert's Mass in C in the Parish Church on January 7. The soloists, who made a great impression, were Mr. F. Major, Mr. J. E. Whitwan, of Winchester Cathedral, and boys of Milford Church Choir. Mr. Abdy Williams, the conductor of the Society, played as a finale Bach's Toccata in F. Praise is due to Mr. W. R. Beesley, the choirmaster, and Mrs. Beesley, the organist of the Church, for their training of the boys, whose singing was excellent. The performance was much appreciated by a large congregation, to many of whom this kind of music was a novelty.

NAIROBI (B.E.A.).—A concert was given at the Railway Institute on November 19, under the patronage of His Excellency The Governor, in aid of the St. Mark's Extension. Pianoforte solos and duets, vocal solos and quartets, a Pianoforte quartet by Reinecke, and a movement from Mendelssohn's Pianoforte trio, Op. 16, made up the programme, which was arranged under the direction of Mr. W. F. Misquith (pianist and organist).

NEATH.—Particular interest attached to the concert of the Neath Choral Society on December 18, as it provided the first performance of Prof. David Jenkins's Cantata, 'The storm.' The work marks a distinct advance in style on the part of the composer, and contains many pages of impressive and strongly characterized music. Much of the work is declamatory, but there are pages of continuous musical texture that are extremely well conceived. The solo parts were interpreted by Miss Jennie Ellis. Mr. T. Hopkin Evans conducted the choir of 150 and the orchestra of fifty. The Society has chosen Cowen's 'The Veil' as its contribution on April 28 to the South Wales Musical Festival (April 27-May 1).

SASKATOON (CANADA).—The first performance here of 'The Messiah' was given on December 3 by the Oratorio Society, at Third Avenue Methodist Church. The choral singing was of creditable quality, and the solos were adequately sung by Miss Beatrice Overton, Mrs. E. M. Counsell, Mr. Norman Douglas, and Mr. W. Davidson Thomson. Mr. William Preston conducted, and Mr. Fred. M. Gee was at the organ. A small orchestra assisted.

TORONTO.—Mr. Viggo Kihl, the recently appointed professor of the pianoforte at the Conservatory of Music, obtained a great success with his first public recital at the Conservatory. Subsequent appearances have increased his favour with public and Press.

TREDEGAR.—The Harmonic Ladies' Choral Society gave a successful concert on December 18, when a number of glees and part-songs, including Spofforth's 'Hail, smiling morn,' and Cooke's 'Strike the lyre,' were given under the direction of Mr. Evan Jones. The soloists of the concert were Miss Lily Moffitt and Miss Gwladys Smith (vocalists), and Miss Lillie Selden (violinist).

VANCOUVER (B.C.).—A notable event in the musical life of this town was the annual performance of Handel's 'The Messiah,' given on December 30 at First Presbyterian Church by the Vancouver Musical Society. Mr. George P. Hicks conducted an interpretation that earned the highest praise. The solo work was undertaken by Mrs. Chandler Sloan, Mrs. Gideon Hicks, Mr. Karl Johnston, and Mr. Hamilton Earle. Choir and orchestra numbered two hundred performers.

WOKING.—'Beethoven House' was inaugurated recently with a miscellaneous concert organized by Messrs. Clark, of Guildford. The artists were Miss Frances Crook (vocalist), Miss Dorothy Vincent (pianist), and Mr. Harold Montague.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

On January 4, 'Parsifal' was produced at the Grand-Opéra. M. Franz, whose singing and acting deserve warm praise, and who has become one of the best Wagnerian tenors of to-day, appeared in the title-part, very well supported by M. Delmas as Gurnemanz, Mlle. Bréval as Kundry, M. Journet as Klingsor, and M. Lestelly as Amfortas. The parts of the Flower-Maidens were excellently sung, and the orchestra, conducted by M. André Messager, came in for its share of the success.

The comments to which the production of Wagner's last masterpiece at Paris has given rise do not differ much from what has often been said or written previously to the fatal date of 1913. Must one closely adhere to the letter of Wagner's express wish, and decide that 'Parsifal' should never be given but at Bayreuth? Or, considering his wish in the spirit, and esteeming that the reasons which prompted him to utter it have ceased to exist, shall one admit that nowadays, given the general respect for and understanding of Wagner's music, philosophy, and stage directions, he would himself have no objection to 'Parsifal' being performed at several of the greater lyric theatres of Europe?

Both theories have been upheld here and elsewhere. And the question has given rise to much debate among French critics, a majority of whom, however, maintained that 'Parsifal' at Bayreuth, despite incidental shortcomings, will always create a deeper, more powerful impression: that only there does the work appear in its true atmosphere.

The outcome of the discussions, in short, is that even if to produce 'Parsifal' out of Bayreuth be not, as a matter of principle, the desecration that some allege it to be, it becomes a kind of desecration for want of certain necessary spiritual elements—a state of things more easy to feel than to demonstrate.

On the other hand, it should not be forgotten that among the younger musical circles of Paris a strong reaction against Wagner's influence has begun. Headed at first, for widely different reasons, by Dr. Saint-Saëns and M. Claude Debussy, the movement has spread simultaneously with the more general reaction against the musical tenets of the German school. That is perhaps the reason why several writers, although acknowledging the beauty of 'Parsifal,' speak of it in terms of somewhat demurring admiration. And certainly, had the production of 'Parsifal' at Paris come fifteen years earlier, the enthusiasm would have been far greater.

After a series of gala performances in its integrity the work has been curtailed for the purposes of production on ordinary nights. The chief suppressions affect the narrative of Gurnemanz in the first Act and the third, and Kundry's imprecations in the second.

At the Opéra-Comique have been given M. Manuel de Falla's 'La Vie Brève,' and M. Franco Leoni's 'Francesca da Rimini,' the former with great, the latter with moderate success. The cast of 'La Vie Brève' comprised Mesdames Marguerite Carré and Brohly, Messrs. Francell and Vieuille; that of 'Francesca da Rimini,' Mlle. Vix, Messrs. Francell and Boulogne. M. Ruhlmann conducted.

There appears to be a dearth of modern French music at the Sunday Orchestral Concerts. During the past month the Concerts-Colonne have provided but a small tone-poem by M. Pierre Langlois, 'Les Moulins de Don Quichotte,' and a Scene from a lyric-drama by M. Max d'Olonne, 'l'Etrangère.' The latter work, though moderately original, asserts a lofty purpose, and is not devoid of merit. The vocalists were Mlle. Hatto and M. Lheureux.

At the Concerts-Lamoureux was given M. Delvincourt's Cantata, 'Faust et Hélène.' A number of critics have put forward justifiable objections to the practice of thus producing tasks written solely in view of a prize competition. Another far more interesting number, on January 11, consisted of two songs with orchestral accompaniment, by M. J. Guy Ropartz, sung by Madame Claire Croiza. The Concerts-Lamoureux have also given, on January 18, Mahler's fourth Symphony; on January 25, an interesting Festival of Russian music.

M. Alfred Casella will give, on February 2, a concert of contemporary Italian music by little-known composers forming the more industrious, serious, and advanced section of the Italian school.

At the first concert of the Société Nationale, M. Ricardo Viñes played M. Debussy's 'Pour le piano,' which he had introduced on a similar occasion exactly twelve years ago. He also played works by Moussorgsky, Albeniz, and Balakirev's 'Islamey.' At the Société Indépendante, on January 14, he gave for the first time M. Erik Satie's 'Chapitres tournés en tous sens,' a set of three small pieces of humorous character.

At the same concert of the Société Indépendante were given three original and beautiful sets of songs by M. Stravinsky, on Japanese lyrics, by M. Delage, on Hindu lyrics, and by M. Ravel, on poems by Mallarmé. The vocalists were Mlle. Rose Féart, Madame Engel-Bathori, and Madame Nikitina.

Madame Nikitina repeated M. Stravinsky's songs with no less success at l'Ecole des Hautes Etudes Sociales. On the same occasion M. Léo Ornstein made his first public appearance at Paris as pianist and composer, playing M. Schönberg's pieces, Opp. 11 and 19, and his own 'Impressions de Notre-Dame,' which were received with favour.

M. Rislér is devoting a series of recitals to the whole of Bach's 'Wohltemperiertes Klavier,' the last ten Sonatas of Beethoven, and works by modern composers.

M. Ferruccio Busoni is giving three recitals at the Salle Erard, and has played, at the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, Dr. Saint-Saëns's fifth Concerto.

Señor Pablo Casals has received the Cross of the Legion of Honour.

Madame Protopopova-Defosse has given a remarkably good recital of songs by Borodin, Balakirev, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and Rachmaninov.

The next Russian opera and ballet season will take place at the Grand-Opéra. It will include the production of M. Igor Stravinsky's 'The Nightingale,' and Dr. Richard Strauss's 'Joseph.'

The monthly concert of the Schola Cantorum was devoted to 'Incidental music,' the numbers being Beethoven's 'Egmont,' M. J. Guy Ropartz's 'Pêcheurs d'Islande,' Bizet's 'l'Arlésienne,' and M. d'Indy's 'Médée.'

A pianoforte of an altogether new kind will shortly appear on the Paris market; its strings, we are told, vibrate under the influence, not of hammers, but of electric currents. The tone is said to be wonderfully pure and full.

Foreign Notes.

A new instrument, a Tonreines-Kontra-Glockengeläut, invented by Kapellmeister Gorter and constructed by Max Enders, of Mayence, is used at these performances.—The song recital given by Frau Hermine d'Albert at the Bechstein Hall was one of considerable interest. Hausegger played his own accompaniments. Symphonies by Brahms (No. 2), Bruckner (No. 4), under C. M. Artz, and Beethoven (No. 9), under Oscar Fried, were performed by the Philharmonic Orchestra.—Bruno Kittel with his Choral Society and the same Orchestra gave a first hearing of Hugo Wolf's 'Christnacht' and Bruckner's 150th Psalm.—At one of the Popular concerts an interesting performance of Saint-Saëns' Prelude to 'Le Déluge' (for strings only) was given. Three new works by Ph. Scharwenka—a Sonata for viola (Op. 106), a Duet for violin and viola (Op. 105), and a Trio for pianoforte, violin, and viola—were successfully produced at the Harmoniumsaal.—Ibsen's 'Peer Gynt' with Edvard Grieg's music, is to be given at the Schauspielhaus. Madame Nina Grieg, the widow of the celebrated Norwegian composer, will be present at the first performance.—Max Reger's 'Variations and Fugue on a merry theme by A. Hiller,' was the feature of the fourth Sinfonie-Abend of the Court Orchestra. Herr Reger was also heard in Bach's fifth 'Brandenburg' Concerto. He played the pianoforte part at a uniform pianissimo.—The Berlin Mozart-Community announced for January 18 and 19 a Mozart-Festival, with Lilli Lehmann, Max Fiedler, and Arthur Schnabel as soloists. The programme includes the C minor Mass, under Fritz Rückward. The profits of this Festival will go to the Salzburg-Mozartheum.—A very much appreciated performance by the Jaques-Dalcroze pupils was given at the concert-hall of the Königliche-Hochschule für Musik.

S'GRAVENHAGE.

Madame Cahier, with the Concert-gebouw Orchestra under Mengelberg, made a sensational success in Mahler's 'Lied von der Erde.'—A performance of Gounod's 'Redemption' was announced for January 26 by the Society 'Richard Hol,' under F. Rosske.

MEININGEN.

Under the conductorship of Max Reger, the Court Orchestra produced with very great success a new orchestral melodrama, 'Der Gott und die Bayadere,' by Hermann Unger.

MUNICH.

It will cause wide satisfaction to hear that the first complete critical edition of Mozart's letters and those of his family, by Ludwig Schiedermair, music historian of the Bonn University, has just been published. Vol. i. and vol. ii. contain Mozart's letters; vol. iii. and vol. iv. contain the letters of his family; vol. v. a Mozart-iconography.—Bruckner's Mass in F minor made a deep impression when recently performed here under Herr Rohr's conductorship.—At the Musikalische Akademie, Mahler's third Symphony was executed under Bruno Walter, the composer's favourite pupil.—M. The correspondent of The Times at Nice writes as follows in the January 16 issue: 'Master Anthony Asquith's lecture at the Cap d'Antibes Hotel on Wednesday evening was intended as a surprise for the Prime Minister, who had never heard his son lecture in public before. His subject was "The great composers—Beethoven, Mozart, Chopin, and Grieg," and he described the characteristics of their music, sketched their lives, and touched on their personal attributes, which he illustrated by anecdotes, especially that of the boy Mozart being surprised while playing in a garret in the middle of the night. He also referred to modern composers. The lecture lasted twenty minutes, and the Prime Minister was delighted with it.' The surprise story is generally told of Handel.

Answers to Correspondents.

F. PRATT.—'Martha' was performed for the first time in England at Covent Garden, on July 1, 1858, and for the first time with English words at Drury Lane, on October 11, 1858. We have no further information concerning these productions. The address you gave seemed inadequate.

F. B.—The origin of 'The Harmonious Blacksmith' is fully discussed in Grove's Dictionary. To couple this tune with Longfellow's 'Tell me not in mournful numbers' would be excellent as a jest.

C. Y.—Mr. H. Saxe Wyndham has written a volume on Sullivan in Bell's 'Miniature Series,' price 1s. For more detailed information B. W. Findon's 'Sir Arthur Sullivan' (J. Nisbet, 24, Berners Street) would be useful.

M. H.—We will answer your question to the best of our ability when you inform us of your name and address.

FOR SOLO VOICES AND CHORUS.

(To be Scored for Orchestra in due course.)

Vocal Score, Paper, 2s.; Boards, 2s. 6d.; Cloth, gilt, 3s. 6d.

Each copy of the First Edition will contain as a Frontispiece a Portrait of the late Composer, from the painting by J. J. Alsop, R.B.A.

"Lovers of the music of Alfred R. Gaul will be glad to learn that his last work, a Shakespearean Suite, entitled "The Bard of Avon," will shortly be published by Messrs. Novello. The libretto largely consists of a sequence of well-known songs and famous and familiar passages from the dramas, set for chorus and orchestra, with tenor and soprano solos, the whole in the composer's most spontaneous manner. Indeed, the charm of the movements may be said to equal the best of his previous work, if not to surpass it; which, after all, is precisely what might be anticipated as the outcome of an inspiration warmed by enthusiasm and intensified by the varied beauty and magnificence of the text."—Birmingham Daily Gazette, December 23, 1913.

PASSION SERVICE.

(24th Thousand.)

Vocal Score, Paper, 2s. 6d.; Boards, 3s.; Cloth, 4s.; Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.

The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out so as to form a series of six distinct "scenes." The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: "The Traitor at the Table," "The Denial," "The Condemnation before Pilate," "The Mockery on Calvary," "The Shadow of Death," and "The Holy Sepulchre."

Arranged for a limited Orchestra—namely, Strings, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Cornets, Bass Trombone or Euphonium, and Kettledrums. The gratuitous loan of the Orchestral Parts of the Eight Cantatas: THE HOLY CITY (162nd thousand), THE TEN VIRGINS, JOAN OF ARC, THE PASSION SERVICE, ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS, UNA, THE PRINCE OF PEACE, RUTH (70th thousand), may be had from the Composer's Executors, Gillott Lodge, Edgbaston.

"FELSTED SCHOOL CONCERT.—The choruses were rendered in perfect style and with grand effect. One of the best things of the evening was the choral song, 'The Erl King' (Gaul), in which the Phantom Quartet was sung unaccompanied."—East Anglian Daily Times, Dec., 1913.

TOILERS OF THE DEEP.

CANTATA FOR FEMALE VOICES.

Reduced Price, One Shilling.

"The musical settings are twelve in number, the part-writing for first and second sopranos and contraltos. The utmost care and finish has been bestowed in wedding appropriate music to the verse, and Mr. Gaul has written nothing finer, nor more melodious and captivating in this branch of composition. . . . Taking the cantata as a whole, it is a delightful work, replete with artistic workmanship, and, above all, melodious and expressive."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

THE ELFIN HILL. OPERETTA.

(Arranged for Small Orchestra.)

Reduced Price, One Shilling.

"Mr. Gaul has been particularly happy in infusing the Norse spirit into that portion of his music which deals with goblin life in Norway. When the goblins become visitors in fairyland, the character of the music changes; lightness is its predominant feature, perhaps the choicest fragment being a fairy dance. This latter, together with a very characteristic dance of elves and a shadow dance, was beautifully executed."—Birmingham Gazette.

THE BIRDS.

SIX VOCAL TRIOS

Complete, 1s.; or in Six Numbers, 2d. each.

"By the production of these trios Mr. Gaul has made a valuable addition to the many beautiful and useful compositions he has formerly given to the public."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

MERBECKE'S COMMUNION MUSIC (A.D. 1550)

EDITED, WITH AN ORGAN ACCOMPANIMENT, BY CHARLES VILLIERS STANFORD.

"The Plainsong has been carefully compared with the original, and, in translating it into modern notation, the note values (which are so vital to the due declamation of the words) have been scrupulously preserved. The melody should be sung in unison and in free time. Accents have been placed over the important notes which require a stress in order to make the meaning of the phrase clear. Marks of expression are added in the organ part only, and occasional alternations of men's and boys' voices are suggested for the sake of contrast and variety."—C.V.S.

"An admirable edition of Merbecke."—Musical News."Most nobly and ably done."—Organist and Choirmaster.

WASTED, AND WORSE,

are the thousands of hours spent daily over futile "practice" of scales, &c., supposed to make good pianists, but usually failing to do so. Worse than wasted, because a good touch is often ruined in the process.

Avoid all these ills by taking the Course of Postal Lessons in the well-known MACDONALD SMITH SYSTEM, enabling you to play better than ever before, without drudgery. Special Course also for mere beginners.

Pianoforte Sight-Playing By a New Method.

When playing at sight the mere sight of the chords should suggest the appropriate muscular actions for playing them. There should be no need to translate mentally the symbols into their musical values, and then further to translate the musical values into muscular actions. These operations demand mental effort and occupy time—however rapid may seem the process.

The Ehremayer System establishes the direct method of sight-playing. The student is trained to translate automatically the printed symbols into muscular actions, so that, even when playing the most intricate chords and passages, the fingers will instinctively fall upon the correct keys.

Much more can be learned by three months' systematic study of the Ehremayer System for 15 minutes daily than by years spent in ordinary practising for several hours daily. If you have difficulty in sight-playing—even though otherwise you are an expert player—the Ehremayer System will be of the greatest benefit to you.

BOSWORTH EDITION.

IMPORTANT NEW WORK BY ALGERNON H. LINDO

A TREATISE ON MODULATION

WITH TYPICAL EXAMPLES FROM WELL-KNOWN WORKS.

In this volume the principles of Modulation are explained with the greatest clearness and simplicity. The chapter giving examples of Modulation, first from a major and then from a minor key, to every other major and minor key, will facilitate materially the work of the student. Great assistance will also be found in the numerous examples of Modulation drawn from the works of past and present composers.

PRICE 3s. NET.

The arrangement is admirable, the pupil being taken from one step to another in a logical and progressive manner. Numerous examples are supplied, and all technical expressions are avoided as far as possible. Both the professor and the student working alone will find the book of the greatest service.—Manchester Courier.

His treatise is well and clearly written, and contains some typical examples of harmonic progressions taken from Mozart, Schubert, Chopin, and many others. It should be a useful book to the young student.—The Daily Telegraph.

"Modulation," by Algernon H. Lindo, is a popular treatise on the art of passing from key to key. Very clearly written and amply illustrated with musical examples, it should prove a boon to the clever student who is anxious to run rapidly through the mazes of modern harmony. The treatise begins straight away with the chord of the dominant seventh, and plunges straight into the short cuts allowed by modern tonality. This system has its advantages, and saves considerable time over the old method. This book is a clever one, and should prove invaluable as a text-book for the more gradual course of study.—Musical.

SIR EDWARD E. COOPER.

In the promotion of no other Art besides that of music is the co-operation of amateurs so conspicuously advantageous. Many of the most important enterprises connected with the popularisation and advancement of the Art owe almost their existence to the sanity and altruism of amateurs. It is not merely that they contribute a capital of brains, but they also provide the sinews of war. Musicians often show themselves quite capable of dealing with vital questions of ways and means, but not infrequently they have souls far above mundane things, and generally their preoccupation with the practice of their Art does not tend to enable them to view business affairs with the detachment and cool-headedness that are so essential in the conduct of administrative matters in which monetary expenditure is concerned. Our great music schools are especially indebted to amateur wisdom, and to no one more than the subject of this sketch, Alderman Sir Edward E. Cooper, the Chairman of the Committee of the Royal Academy of Music.

Edward E. Cooper was born at Old Windsor on February 5, 1848. His mother came of a musical family. His sister married Robert Riviere, whose sister married Sir Henry R. Bishop. As a boy Edward Cooper was the first pupil of Horatia, the daughter of the great Lord Nelson, when in 1854, as Mrs. Ward, a widow, she opened a school in what is now known as Westbourne Gardens, Bayswater. During his youth he came into social contact with many well-known executive musicians of the day, including Howell, the double-bass player, Weiss the bass singer, and Lewis Thomas another bass equally famous. He first sang in public as an amateur at a concert given in the now no longer existing Hanover Square Rooms (the concert hall of which had remarkably good acoustic properties) and frequently after this at the musical evenings held at the residence of Madame Bassano, in Howley Place. The hostess took a minor part at the production of 'Elijah' at the Birmingham Festival (when Mendelssohn himself conducted), and on the second day of the Festival sang, with Madame Grisi, 'Quis est homo' from Rossini's 'Stabat Mater,' a show piece now seldom heard in concert rooms. These details of comparatively small doings in the musical world are pertinent, because they suffice to show that Edward Cooper received in this period of his life a bias towards music that was no doubt the spring from which flowed his later enthusiasm and usefulness to the community. If it had not been for this experience he might have been merely an excellent golf or billiard player, or he might have deviated to the turf, or become simply a genial City magnate instead of being what he is, an active and valued factor in London musical life! As his voice settled down in early manhood he took private lessons from Pasquale Goldberg, who was a Professor at the R.A.M. After singing in the choirs of various churches and at the pro-Cathedral, Kensington, he was admitted by Stainer as a deputy tenor in the St. Paul's Cathedral Choir, where he sang (always as an amateur) for twenty years. As a choirman he took part in the services held in connection with Queen Victoria's Jubilee, and the coronations of King Edward and King George. He joined the Madrigal Society of London (a close body which admits only a limited number of amateurs) in 1881, and recently he was made a Vice-President.

His taste in the direction of alla cappella music—a draught of which in these hectic times is nectar to the ear and mind—has been further gratified by his membership of the Abbey Glee Club, which he joined in 1889 and of which he is now the hon. treasurer. He was a Steward of the now defunct Sacred Harmonic Society, which in its time was a great asset in Metropolitan musical life. He is a Fellow of the Royal Philharmonic Society, and one of the Trustees of the recently-instituted Foundation Fund. For many years he was hon. treasurer of the R.A.M., and on the death of Mr. Thomas Threlfall in 1908 he was elected chairman of the Committee of Management. It has been in the latter capacity that he has rendered his chief services to the cause of higher musical education in this country. A bold and great decision fraught with possibilities had to be made during the term of his office. The old premises in Tenterden Street, with all their cherished memories, had to be entirely rebuilt and the site much expanded, or else another site had to be found. All the world now knows it was decided to erect the handsome and commodious structure, with its fine concert hall and numerous teaching rooms, which adorns the Marylebone Road. The result of the move has justified the most sanguine expectations, and the Academy can now boast an establishment equal in equipment to the best of its kind in the world. Another outlet for Sir Edward Cooper's musical gregariousness has been the Musicians' Company, of which he was Junior Warden 1903-4, Senior Warden 1904-5, and Master 1905-6. When Junior Warden he assisted in the reception of the present King and Queen (then the Prince and Princess of Wales) on the opening of the Company's Tercentenary Exhibition at Fishmongers' Hall on June 27, 1904. On the retirement of the late Murray Guthrie, in response to a requisition headed by Sir Henry Seymour King and other leading bankers in the Ward of Cornhill, he was elected Alderman of that Ward in October, 1909. He was Sheriff of London in 1912-13, and he received his knighthood from King George in 1913.

The esteem in which he is held by the heads of the profession is evidenced by the fact that he was chosen to represent the art of music on the occasion of the presentation to King George of the copy of the Bible specially prepared to celebrate the 300th anniversary of the publication of the Authorized Version. A recent instance of his thoughtful generosity was the gift he made to the British Museum, which is recorded in the following correspondence:

To the Trustees of the British Museum, London.
25th July, 1910.

DEAR SIRs,—May I ask your acceptance of a Volume containing music for the Viola da Gamba by English composers of the 17th century? The music has been deciphered from the old Tablature, translated into modern notation, and edited by Dr. Thomas Lea Southgate.

The original manuscript, compiled circa 1660, from which this has been taken, was left by Dr. Henry Watson to the Corporation of Manchester for their Library; it is through their courtesy that I have been able to have a copy made for presentation to the British Museum.

I believe that this volume of no fewer than 215 pieces by our early writers, will be found to be of the greatest interest to all musicians, who can now study this hitherto unknown music in the National Library.

I beg to remain, Dear Sirs,

Yours faithfully,

EDWARD E. COOPER.

Department of Manuscripts,
British Museum, London, W.C.,
25th July, 1910.

DEAR SIR,—In reply to your kind letter of this date, I beg to say that the Trustees of the British Museum will be very pleased to accept the transcript of the Manchester Viola da Gamba MS. which you are good enough to offer to have made for this Institution.

I am, dear Sir, Yours faithfully,

A. HUGHES-HUGHES.

Lady Cooper was a Miss Crampton, and she too is an excellent practical musician. She studied the piano under Sir Julius Benedict and the organ under Limpus, of St. Michael's, Cornhill. On the occasion of the last appearance in public of the late Otto Goldschmidt (husband of Jenny Lind), which was at the Schumann centenary celebration organized by the Musicians' Company, Lady Cooper, at his special request, played with him the composer's Variations for two pianofortes. It is interesting to note that Otto Goldschmidt's last previous public performance of the Variations was when, forty years before, he played with Madame Schumann in Hamburg.

SOME UNKNOWN AND LITTLE-KNOWN WORKS OF WAGNER.

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

Few people, even among those who are acquainted with Wagner the opera composer, know what a quantity of works he wrote in other genres. A few of these have been published, but have apparently never got into general circulation; while others have hitherto remained in manuscript. Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel, however, are bringing out a complete edition of Wagner's works, uniform with their other Gesamtausgaben, and admirably edited by Mr. Balling. Some of the volumes have already been issued—the full score of the early opera 'Die Feen,' for example, and a volume of choral works; the remainder are yet in the press, but Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel have been kind enough to place a set of proofs, and in some cases the manuscripts, at my disposal. I propose to-day to run a rapid eye over these unknown and little-known works of his, omitting, however, the 'Hochzeit' fragment, 'Die Feen,' and 'Das Liebesverbot,' which are too large for consideration here. It is only with the pianoforte works, the songs, the choral works, and the overtures that we shall now concern ourselves.

Everyone knows that Wagner, as a child, plunged into musical composition without any preliminary study, realised that a technique was necessary, and, after a vain attempt to master the mysteries of composition from Logier's 'Method of thorough-bass,' placed himself under Theodor Weinlig, the cantor of St. Thomas's, who dismissed him, after six months' thorough tuition, with the remark that he now knew enough to be independent. As yet the boy seems to have had no inclination towards opera. The raw works of his adolescence had all been instrumental; among them was the Overture in B flat major (1830) that was performed in the Leipsic Theatre, and in which the drum-beat every four bars ended by moving the audience to uncontrollable merriment. It is not till the summer of 1832 that he plans a first opera, 'Die Hochzeit'; he writes the text, but composes no more than a fragment of the music. Meanwhile he produces, as the result of Weinlig's schooling, a number of works more or less in the conventional style. The Pianoforte sonata in B flat major that was published by Breitkopf & Härtel as the composer's Op. 1 is dedicated to Weinlig, under whose eye the work was written. His teacher had evidently seen the need for curbing the exuberance of the boy's undisciplined mind. He made him write simply, in the set forms, and with regard to the clarities of the pure vocal style. For this first sonata, Wagner tells us, Weinlig induced him to take an early sonata by Pleyel as a model; the whole work was to be shaped on 'strictly harmonic and thematic lines.' Wagner himself never thought much of it. But if it is no more than an imitation of the current sonata style, it is an unmistakably capable imitation. Weinlig was right; he had given his pupil independence. In all these youthful works, indeed, we are struck by the unquestioning self-confidence of the manner, and by the boyish vigour that animates them. As a reward for his docility in the matter of the sonata he was allowed by Weinlig to compose a Pianoforte fantasia in F sharp minor. He treated this, he says, in a more informal style. It is really a quite powerful work for a boy of eighteen. It defines a mood, and maintains it with singular persistence; it expresses something truly felt; it comes from the brooding absorption of spirit that was afterwards to produce the 'Faust' Overture. It is liberally sown with recitative passages that suggest some knowledge of Bach (the Chromatic Fantasia or the G minor Fantasia for organ), or of Beethoven (Pianoforte sonata in A flat, Op. 110, &c.). The manner and the feeling of the Adagio suggest the slow movement of Beethoven's fifth Symphony, the later ornamentation of the main melodic idea being quite in the style of that movement. Altogether the Fantasia is by no means a work to be despised; it is the one composition of Wagner's of this period in which we catch a decided note of promise for the future.

The Polonaise in D major for four hands (1831) is more in the conventional manner, but quite interesting, and as original as we can expect the average young composer of eighteen to be. The A major Sonata (Op. 4, 1831) flows on in the glib, confident way that is characteristic of all his early instrumental works, and has many good points. The weakest movement is the third—a rather amateurish fugue. There is some expression in the slow movement, and a general freedom of style everywhere except in the fugue. The idiom as a whole is that of the early Beethoven, but occasionally the writing suggests a boy who knew something of Weber and of the later Beethoven, though his invention and his technique were as yet equal only to imitating the simpler models.

For its day the Symphony in C major (1832) is a very capable piece of student work; the interest slackens very considerably in the Finale, but the other movements are handled with the customary young-Wagnerian vigour and confidence. In spite of the ease and the cleverness of it, however, we can rarely feel that it is anything more than a piece of competent school work, though there is undeniable thoughtfulness in the Andante.

The work of the next five years varies in quality and purpose in a most puzzling way. In 1832 he writes the 'King Enzo' Overture, under the influence, as he tells us in 'Mein Leben,' of Beethoven. It is plainly modelled on the dramatic overture of the 'Egmont' and 'Coriolan' type—a type that Mendelssohn, in the 'Ruy Blas' and elsewhere, afterwards cultivated, without however adding anything to it. The young Wagner has a thorough grasp of the form. The Overture is concise and well balanced; all the details are clearly seen in relation to the dominant idea. The thematic invention is good, the themes being not only expressive in themselves but capable of bearing the weight of a certain amount of dramatic development. Yet after writing this fine Overture, that really may point without presumption to Beethoven as its parent, he was capable of producing in 1836 the shapeless and frothy 'Polonia' Overture, which is the oddest mixture of a pseudo-Polish idiom and the cheap, assertive melody of 'Rienzi.' Here and there it gives us a foretaste of his later power of climax-building, but on the whole it is a feeble and amorphous work. The 'Rule, Britannia' Overture (1836) is hardly any better; it is a long-winded and pointless dissertation on our patriotic song, the original tune being by far the best thing in it. The 'Columbus' Overture of the preceding year is rather better. Its style is a curious blend of Beethoven, 'Rienzi,' and the Italian opera; it is oddly anticipatory of Liszt in its repetitions and its make-believe development: but the work has a sort of strength.

It is evidently the outcome of a vision clearly seen, and translated into as good music as Wagner's powers at that time permitted.

Meanwhile in 1832—the same year as the 'King Enzo' Overture and the C major Symphony—he had written 'Seven Compositions to Goethe's 'Faust'—'The soldiers' song,' the 'Peasants under the Linden,' 'The song of the rat,' 'The song of the flea,' Mephistopheles' song ('Was machst du mir vor Liebchens Tür'), Margaret's song ('Meine Ruh' ist hin'), and a 'melodrama' to accompany the recitation of Margaret's prayer to the Virgin.* Almost all of these have individuality, the least notable being Mephistopheles' song. The soldiers' song is breezy, with one or two crudities in the vocal part-writing. The 'Bauern unter der Linde' is fresh and gay; the rat and flea songs are fairly humorous; it is rather curious that Wagner's rat song should begin with the full scale of D major in descending motion, while that of Berlioz commences with the same scale in ascent. Margaret's song is quite good, though it moves a little stiffly, and has neither the ardour of Schubert's setting nor the perfect mating of idea and expression that we find in that masterpiece. Wagner, indeed, developed very slowly. For a long time his genius could only move heavily: there was no swiftness in him, either of idea or of form,—no consuming heat. The melodrama melody is expressive, and the reiterated syncopations are effective. Wagner probably chose the melodrama form, rather than a purely lyrical setting of the words, because he felt that the former gave the dramatist in him more scope.

In 1832-33 the dramatic impulse became very strong in him. He had written the 'Hochzeit' fragment and 'Die Feen' by the end of 1833, and between 1834 and 1836 he finished the 'Liebesverbot.' Already he had a technique equal to the expression of all the dramatic thinking of which he was capable at that time. How dexterous his hand had become is shown incidentally in the aria he added to Marschner's 'Vampyr' in 1833,—a very vigorous and finished piece of work. There is the same skill in the 'Romance of Max' that he added to the Singspiel 'Marie, Max, and Michel' (1837). There is piquancy in the scoring of the latter, and the vocal part has a rhythmic variety that we do not often find in 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin.'† Apparently the only non-dramatic work he wrote was the 'New Year Cantata,' which is one of the freshest and most pleasing works of his youth. It consists of an overture and four other movements; the chorus takes part in the second and fourth of these, but in the latter the vocal parts are merely sketched in, and the words are lacking. In the slow opening section of the overture he introduces in the violas and 'cellos, with excellent effect, the theme of the Andante of his C major Symphony; it is apparently intended to symbolise the sadness of the departing year.

* Three years before this, Berlioz had written 'Eight scenes from Goethe's "Faust"'—the germ of his 'Damnation of Faust.'

† The new volume of songs contains an undated 'Aria of Orovisio,' which he added to Bellini's 'Norma.' This must date from the early days of his infatuation with Bellini. The aria is an amusingly skilful imitation of all the tricks-of-trade of the Italian opera of the 'thirties.

It is impossible not to be captivated by the sincerity and the transparent simplicity of this little work.

During 1838 and 1839 his time was fully taken up with his theatrical duties at Königsberg and Riga, the composition of 'Rienzi,' and the working out of other dramatic ideas; so that from 1837 to 1840 what may be called the occasional compositions are few in number. With the exception of the Aria for 'Marie, Max, and Michel,' and the 'Faust' compositions, his vocal works had so far all been settings of words of his own. Between 1837 and 1844 the texts of almost all his songs and choral works were by other people. At Riga, in 1837, he set a poem by Harald von Brackel in praise of the Czar Nicholas, for soprano or tenor solo, chorus, and orchestra. The piece is appropriately broad and massive, and imposing enough in mere volume; but it is impossible to believe that Wagner's heart was in a work of this kind.

Of much more interest is 'Der Tannenbaum,' a setting of a poem by Scheuerlein (end of 1838). The song is expressive, though the effect lies more in the general colour, the harmony, and the pictorial realisation of the scene—the brooding tree, the river, and the boy are all differentiated—than in any particularly striking quality in the melody. The vocal line has more flexibility than is usual with the young Wagner. In July, 1839, he entered upon his Paris adventure. For a while he eagerly pursues his fortune among the theatrical directors; then, as his hopes fail him and need gnaws at his heart, he produces a number of vocal works that he trusts may appeal to the French public. Some of these are pot-boilers pure and simple, the writing of which must have been gall and bitterness to the young composer who had begun to realise the wonderful music there was in him. The lowest depth is touched in the chorus, 'La descente de la Courtille' (1840)—a frank prostitution of his genius to the most superficial French taste of the time. Almost as bad is the song 'Les adieux de Marie Stuart.' A bar or two here and there bears the signature of the true Wagner—he cannot quite keep his real self out of it; but on the whole the song is a desperate, pitiful attempt to manufacture something in the conventional French and Italian operatic idiom of the day. Wagner's tongue must have been in his cheek when he penned such passages as these:

Ex. 1.

BASS. C D B \flat D A \flat B \flat B \flat C D

Other works of this year are more sincere, and most of them have a decided charm. The Albumblatt in E major, written for his friend Kietz, is a simple but engaging piece, with a touch or two of melodic commonplace—the occasional insertion, for example, of a triplet group in a duple-time phrase. The little work is curiously like the 'Lohengrin' of seven years later, in general texture, in melodic and harmonic build, and in the peculiar white light in which it is bathed. The songs to French words, written in Paris in 1839-40, vary greatly in quality. The 'Tout n'est qu'images fugitives' never descends to the depth of banality reached in the 'Marie Stuart,' but the effort to be ingratiatingly French is plainly evident. The 'Dors, mon enfant,' 'Mignonne,' and 'Attente' are all charming; he thinks of the French style and the French public no more than is necessary to lighten the heaviness of his native German manner, and the results are sometimes surprising, particularly in the matter of rhythm. For many years afterwards, as he admits in a well-known letter to Uhlig, he was obsessed by a vocal rhythm of this type:

—a type upon which hundreds of phrases in the 'Flying Dutchman,' 'Tannhäuser,' and 'Lohengrin' are constructed. The best of these French songs have a rhythmic freedom and flexibility that he rarely attained in his later operas. Look, for example, at the following delightfully elastic vocal line from 'Attente':

Ex. 2.

Asses vite.

It has always been evident that the rhythmic sameness of the earlier operas was mainly due to the monotonously regular recurrence of accents in the German verse he wrote at that time. These French songs make it clear—as, by the way, does the aria for 'Marie, Max, and Michel'—that when a more varied metrical scheme was given him his music spontaneously varied with it. One cannot help feeling that in some ways it is a pity he did not meet with more success in Paris—that he was not allowed, in fact, to write some large work with the deliberate intention of appealing to the French taste by an exploitation of the styles and the formulas the Parisian public loved most. Such a work would not have represented the real Wagner, and in the end would probably have been negligible; but it would have given a much needed lightness and elasticity to his imagination, without harming him in any way. He would have benefited by such an experience as emphatically as Handel and Mozart benefited by their experiences with Italian opera. As it was, a certain slowness and ponderousness remain characteristic of Wagner to the end of his days. This inability to concentrate rapidly is instructively shown in his French setting of Heine's 'Les deux Grenadiers' (1839-40). In general expressiveness the song need not fear comparison with Schumann's: perhaps Wagner's treatment of the 'Marseillaise' at the end is even better. But the work has nothing of Schumann's terseness and lyric ease; the whole thing moves a little stiff-jointedly.

The Paris period is a curious one in Wagner's artistic history. He wrote some very good songs, and one or two deplorable things like the 'Marie Stuart' and 'La Descente de la Courtille'; at the same time he was finishing 'Rienzi' and working at the 'Flying Dutchman,' and the 'Faust' Overture assumed its first form. In April, 1842, he settled at Dresden. Between then and 1848 he composed 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin,' and conceived the first idea of the 'Ring' and other works. During this period he wrote no songs or pianoforte pieces: the occasional compositions are all choral works, which is sufficiently accounted for by the fact that Wagner had a good male-voice choir at his disposal. The 'Love feast of the Apostles' is too well known for consideration here; the other works are virtually unknown. For the unveiling of a memorial to King Friedrich August I. he wrote in 1843 a 'Weihegruss' for male voices and brass orchestra, to words by Otto Hohlfeld. The choral portion of this work was published in 1906; the whole version is now published in the Gesamtausgabe, and shows how indispensable is the orchestral part—the long-held vocal notes, for example, being helped out by trumpet, trombone, and horn fanfares, and the whole thing gaining enormously in richness by the discreet occasional entries of the brass. The general style of this work, as of the 'Greeting of Friedrich August the Beloved by his Faithful Subjects' (August, 1844), is that of the Tannhäuser-Lohengrin epoch; some passages in the 'Greeting,' indeed, are extraordinarily reminiscent of the 'Hall of song' chorus. For the re-interment of Weber's remains at Dresden in December, 1844, Wagner wrote a four-part male chorus that again recalls the operatic works of this time. It is the most expressive of Wagner's works of this class, but on the whole a little disappointing; his heart was so thoroughly with Weber that one would have thought the occasion would have wrung some music of the first class out of him.

I do not propose to review the pianoforte works of his later days—the fine Album Sonata in A flat (for Frau Wesendonck, 1853), the 'Ankunft bei den schwarzen Schwänen' (Albumblatt in A flat for the Countess Pourtalès, 1861), the Albumblatt for Betty Schott (1875), and the Züricher 'Vielliebchen' Waltz,—for these must be fairly well known. But no Wagner student can afford to neglect the less familiar works over which I have here cast so cursory a glance. If they do not contain anything that is likely to add to his fame, they at any rate throw an occasional light on him that we should be sorry to lack.

THE NEW MOUSSORGSKY.

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

In the February issue was made, à propos of the Rust case, the remark that one of the characteristic tendencies of this period is our eagerness to make amends for the results of past ignorance and injustice. Among the several attempts towards rehabilitation adduced, none has been more successful, none has had more thorough results, more instructive consequences, than the one made in favour of Moussorgsky. The Russian master stands to men of the 20th century in a light altogether different from that in which he had hitherto appeared.

Strangely unfortunate has been the fate of that master, and no less sad, long after his death, has been the fate of his output. I remember Mr. Arnold Bennett telling me, after having witnessed the production of 'Boris Godounov' at the Paris Opéra, that 'until that moment he had found it impossible to believe that one of the world's masterpieces should have existed and been available to all for over the third part of a century without anyone, except for a few specialists, being aware of the fact.'

This sentence covers the situation that obtained until quite lately. During Moussorgsky's lifetime people who did not altogether ignore him were heartily ashamed of his fondness for 'vulgar' topics, for the dealings with mere peasants, simpletons, or children; of his alleged lack of musical culture and proficiency, of his blunt, unpolished style, his racy plebeian vernacular, his 'solecisms and barbarisms.' Tchaikovsky's disparagement of his love for 'the crude, the puerile, and the ugly' on the one hand; on the other, the current assertion that his works were absolutely unfit for production until the friendly hand of some more expert composer had submitted them to thorough recasting, sum up the opinion entertained by the most influential judges. When not absolutely contemptuous, the Russians inclined to underrate him, and thought they had done enough when they had acknowledged the 'realistic' power of his works, and classed him as one who might have done better. So little was he thought of, that five or six years ago an unknown Russian collector sent over to Paris, without even troubling to ascertain its contents, an autograph manuscript of his, which was sold to Charles Malherbe for a few pounds and was found to contain eleven unknown songs, a lost fragment of the early opera 'Salammbô,' and extremely interesting variants to several other songs—the average commercial value of the copyright being about five times what was given for the manuscript.

After Moussorgsky's death little store was set by his belongings, his unfinished works, his correspondence and the biographical material then available. For over twenty years Stassov's pamphlet (1881) remained the only document and only critical estimation of his work. On this well-meant but not particularly exhaustive essay (Stassov did not even make sufficient use of the many letters written to him by Moussorgsky, which were published in 1911 only) have rested all the biographies written until the present day in France as well as in Russia. It is only nowadays that the scales have turned. The first to move an appeal on Moussorgsky's behalf (in France) was a Russian, M. Pierre d'Alheim, whose wife, a talented singer, devoted herself for a time exclusively to Moussorgsky's songs. A little later came, almost simultaneously, the production of 'Boris Godounov' at the Paris Opéra, attended by immense and telling success; and the disclosure of a wealth of new material, consisting chiefly of the composer's neglected letters and manuscripts. His correspondence with Stassov, with Rimsky-Korsakov, with Cui, with Balakirev, and others has been or is being published. Other manuscripts, besides the precious one acquired by Charles Malherbe, have come to light. A number of learned writers and musicians, among whom the composer Karatyghin, and M. Findeisen, the editor of the Russian Musical Gazette, stand foremost, have undertaken the task of revising, publishing, and expounding his works and his writings. The time will soon come thoroughly to recast all that has been written on his life and on the evolution of his genius. The smallest scrap of manuscript left by him is eagerly scanned, and the publication of his posthumous works (some of them, unfinished, have received from pious hands the finishing touches) will soon be carried through. When all this labour has been completed the legend of Moussorgsky will have disappeared, and we shall come into possession of his true history, now in the making.

Among the recently discovered works, the most significant are, besides some of the songs in the Malherbe manuscript, the first Act of the musical comedy, 'Marriage,' and many fragments (among which are whole scenes) of another musical comedy,

'The fair at Sorotchinski.' Previously, Moussorgsky the humorist was known but by a few songs, not all of them masterpieces, and by the admirable comic or familiar scenes in 'Boris Godounov' and 'Khovanchina.' The score of the 'Marriage' is, in the history of music, altogether a new departure, well worth close study, and affording occasion for many additions to the exegesis of Moussorgsky's tribute.* Likewise the scenes of the 'Fair at Sorotchinski.' In the Malherbe manuscript, a song, 'O thou little star,' written in 1857 (Moussorgsky was then aged eighteen) shows that he displayed individuality far earlier than one was led to suppose from the study of his first published works. The original version, in the same manuscript, of the song 'King Saul,' is far more original and beautiful than the published one, and brings a fresh proof of the fact—already made patent by the comparison between Moussorgsky's real 'Boris Godounov' and the revised editions (1896 and 1908) now current—that his emendators were not always judicious.

But it is above all the correspondence that affords valuable evidence as to what Moussorgsky the artist really was. It stands to reason that one can but claim the absolute right of the composer to be judged upon his own merits, and to stand or fall thereby. Yet many may experience some uneasiness before the assertions that Moussorgsky was insufficiently versed in the practice of his art, that many of his finest inspirations were mere flukes, spoiled by incorrect carrying-out, and on the whole not half as fine as they would have been if he had proved capable of observing at least a few cardinal rules. Even if one acknowledges how greatly standards have changed since the time when such was the current opinion, and how easy it is now to see that mere superstition has passed sentence, in the name of rules, on things whose fitness and beauty are now obvious, is it possible not to wish that a genius like that of Moussorgsky should have been served by more knowledge and greater skill, which would have enabled him to soar even higher?

All doubts on points such as these are removed by the perusal of the correspondence, in which one sees that what Moussorgsky has done he did not through ignorance but deliberately; that he devoted more time to acquiring technical proficiency, and far more thought to the way of using what he knew, than his first critics have led us to suppose.

Extremely characteristic in that respect is a letter to Rimsky-Korsakov, written probably in 1868:

'Truly, after the pompous forte in D major [the work alluded to is Rimsky-Korsakov's "Antar"] what could be more poetical than the melancholy D flat major coming forthwith, without any transition. . . . O transitions! How many fine things were spoiled by you. . . .

'Talking of symphonic working-out, you seem to be afraid of writing as Rimsky-Korsakov and not as Schumann. Let me tell you, what may suit the Germans may not suit us at all. Symphonic working-out is a technical method invented by the Germans, who, when they think, begin by analysing and then demonstrate. We Russians demonstrate forthwith, but may subsequently amuse ourselves with analysing. When at Borodin's home you showed us [the first draft of] 'Antar' you sought no transitions! That is all I have to say on the point.'

It is difficult after having read so much to believe that if Moussorgsky modulated abruptly, or provided any formal type of transition, it was because he knew no better. And it is altogether impossible to understand how, forgetting that most equivocal profession of faith, Rimsky-Korsakov himself, when revising 'Boris Godounov' in 1896, was led to super-add to that score precisely, among many other things, formal transitions of the very kind that Moussorgsky rejected. For instance, in the Prelude to the first Act there is a bar (the twelfth of the 1896 and 1908 editions) in which appears a dominant chord not written by Moussorgsky; he did not write the few bars between the moment when, in the last scene, the usurper disappears and the outbreak of the fool's plaintive song, &c.

Indeed, the revised editions of 'Boris Godounov' remind one again of Sir Hubert Parry's lines on the mixing up of types which are especially apt to different groups of conditions, different situations, and different frames of mind.' It is not a bad thing that Moussorgsky's correspondence should come to make us fully aware of the case.

The question of 'Khovanchina,' despite the newly available materials, remains intricate. A letter of Moussorgsky to Stasov, dated August 22 (September 3), 1880, and saying "Our 'Khovanchina' is finished, except for a small part of the final scene, which we must discuss together from the point of view of scenic arrangements," can be laid in the balance against the current assertion that Moussorgsky had left but a rude, sketchy draft of the work. But in his pamphlet of 1881, Stasov writes that the composer, already drooping and prompted by the desire to finish 'Khovanchina' at all costs, did so in a hurried, haphazard fashion, altering and suppressing many essential parts. Many admirers of Moussorgsky will feel that the score seems to prove the assertion.

But we do not possess all the elements of the case. That the published version does not correspond exactly with Moussorgsky's manuscript is a known fact. Of late a revision has been undertaken, but its final results cannot as yet be foretold. As far as I can judge it is not likely that the verdict of connoisseurs will ever place 'Khovanchina' on a level with 'Boris Godounov.'

To revert to the correspondence I shall say, without for the present quoting any other extracts, that it shows Moussorgsky the man as far more thoughtful, genial, simple, and lovable than he was formerly believed. The letters to Balakirev, now in course of publication, are in that respect most characteristic. A great number of them refer to the early period of Moussorgsky's life, and contain many allusions to his studies and to his aspirations.

In short, there has never been, in the history of musical art, so strange and so sad a case as that of Moussorgsky. Never has an artist of high genius been judged on evidence so incomplete and so inaccurate in all respects. It is to be hoped that there will never again be occasion for so thorough a repeal of a judgment passed by so many ruling authorities, and so long unquestioned.

Occasional Notes.

Mr. George Dyson, the NEW MUSIC-MASTER OF RUGBY SCHOOL. Marlborough College, has been appointed music-master to Rugby School, in succession to Mr. Basil Johnson, whose appointment to Eton College, in succession to Dr. Harford Lloyd, was recorded in our last issue. Mr. Dyson held Organ and Composition Scholarships at the R.C.M. from 1900 to 1904, and the Mendelssohn travelling Scholarship for Composition from 1904 to 1907, during which period he stayed in turn at Florence, Rome, Vienna, Munich, Dresden, and Berlin. He was organist of Greenwich Parish Church from 1901 to 1904, and of St. Paul's at Rome 1905-6. From 1908 to 1911 he was organist and music-master at the Royal Naval College, Osborne, and in addition he initiated musical organization and development in that institution. He became music-master at Marlborough College in 1911. A feature of the musical life in the College has been the organ recitals given by Mr. Dyson, and the institution of chamber-music and choral and orchestral concerts. He took the Oxford Mus. Bac. degree in 1909, the F.R.C.O. in 1910, and the A.R.C.M. diploma for organ in 1903 and for composition in 1904. His compositions include songs, chamber-music, and orchestral pieces.

VIOLONCELLOS in our columns on this subject
AND THE from Mr. Frederick Fellowes RAILWAYS. (Clarence House, Connaught Road,

Reading), commenting on the gross unfairness of the charge recently enforced for the carriage of violoncellos, even when they were carried by hand in a light bag in such a manner as not to be obstructive in any way, any more than a violin or viola in its wooden case. A petition has since been organized by him, and being largely backed by the Orchestral Association it received 173 signatures, including a number of well-known violoncellists and other leading musicians. It was presented to the Railway Clearing House in December last, and was placed before the Board of Railway Managers in January. The result was a refusal without explanation. When a private individual takes the initiative in a case of this kind he is practically powerless to move a large public body of men, but with a number of important forces combined it seems reasonable to hope that any action may at least be modified which hits hard a poorly paid but elevating profession.

Messrs. Schulz-Curtius & Powell have
THE MUNICH issued a prospectus of the Wagner-FESTIVAL. Mozart Festival to be given at Munich in the summer of this year. The central feature is, of course, a series of 'Parsifal' performances, of which the first opens the Festival on July 31, and the last closes it on September 15.
 'Parsifal' will be given six times, 'Tristan und Isolde' and 'Die Meistersinger' each three times, and the 'Ring' cycle twice. The Wagner performances will take place at the Prinzregenten Theatre. Mozart operas will be given on nine evenings at the Residenz and Royal Court Theatres.

The financial report of the Leeds loss of £278, but the gradual falling-off of subscriptions since 1901 was checked.

 It is gratifying to note that by far the most repaying work was Elgar's 'The dream of Gerontius', which brought in the sum of £520. The next best was Bach's Mass in B minor, which brought in £366.
 'Elijah' was actually third, attracting only £353.

A GREAT SCHEME.

The scheme for providing a National Festival Theatre at Glastonbury for the purpose of giving religious and choral drama is now before the public, and an appeal is made for financial support. It is proposed first to erect a temporary theatre to serve a few years, and the cost of this and the performance designed is estimated at £5,000.

The new 'English Music Drama' it is sought to produce is to be founded upon Arthurian legend as told by Malory. Mr. Reginald Buckley and Mr.
 Rutland Boughton collaborate to create the work for the stage. Mr. Boughton in his 'Essay on choral drama,' which is in the book of 'Uther and Igraine,' one of the dramas to be produced, says:

The following pages contain a half-taste of a work which achieves what Wagner failed thoroughly to achieve. I do not intend to depreciate Wagner, of whose work Buckley and I are so greatly indebted; but neither will I depreciate our work by affecting modesty in regard to our continuation of the German master's drama. Wagner has opened the way to the perfection of modern dramatic art.

And later he adds:

Choral drama will succeed where Ibsen failed because of the sacrilege of serious art without beauty. Choral drama will succeed where Wagner failed because of use of stage-plot and problem-talk, and because of his fruitless excitement of the intellect. Choral drama will succeed where Shakespeare failed for lack of tone stuff and mass feeling.

One can only hope that these somewhat staggering statements will not excite prejudice. Such ideals are easier to hold than to realise. It may be said that if the arch-promoters have not full confidence in their powers, they can hardly expect to make converts.

In The Atlantic Monthly for February there is an

OXFORD UNIVERSITY MUSICAL CLUB

ONE-THOUSANDTH MEETING.

In connection with the thousandth meeting of this Club, a reception was held on February 3, by the Principal of Brasenose (President of the Club) and Miss Heberden, in the Town Hall. On February 10, the occasion was still further celebrated, and in true British fashion, by a dinner, which took place in the Hall of New College.

It is interesting at this juncture to recall the circumstances that gave rise to the birth of the Club.
 In the article on Sir Hubert Parry which appeared in the Musical Times of July, 1898 (p. 444), the facts are not quite correctly stated. There is no doubt that it was the remarkable influence Sir Hubert exerted over music at Oxford during his period of studentship (1867-70) that paved the way for later developments; and it may be added that the quartet parties of Professor Donkin and his family, and similar musical gatherings at several of the Colleges, created a favourable atmosphere. The fact that coming events cast their shadows before is shown in the curious circumstance that a year or two before the formation of the Club, Mr. W. F. Donkin who was killed in the Caucasus) prophetically wrote on some quartet parts the initials 'O.U.M.C.', saying that Oxford ought to have a Musical Club.

As a matter of fact the Club was formally constituted on April 3, 1872 (two years after Sir Hubert left Oxford), on a suggestion made by Mr. Mitchell-Innes, now the Very Rev. the Provost of Inverness Cathedral, to Mr. (now Dr.) C. Harford Lloyd, who was elected the first president. A meeting was held in Mr. Lloyd's rooms at Magdalen Hall (now Hertford College) in April, 1872. The minutes of the Club record these facts, and in an interesting letter from Mr. Mitchell-Innes to Dr. Lloyd, the Provost says:

It is all quite fresh in my memory. It was the intense pleasure which I derived from those delightful string quartets in Wild's rooms [at Christ Church] which made me regret that a larger audience could not share the pleasure, and this suggested the idea of a club which you took up so keenly and carried into effect.

Over a hundred past and present members of the Club attended the dinner, including the president (Dr. C. B. Heberden, Principal of Brasenose), the Vice-Chancellor, the Senior Proctor, the Warden of New College, the Master of University, the President of St. John's, the Registrar, the Poet Laureate, Mr. Sedley Taylor (from Cambridge), Mr. A. E. Donkin, Mr. E. H. Donkin, Dr. C. H. Lloyd, Dr. Roberts, Dr. Harwood, Dr. Walker, Dr. Allen, Mr. W. Warde-Fowler, Mr. D. F. Tovey, Mr. R. F. Holme, Mr. Bruce Richmond, Mr. Gerrans, Mr. H. G. Ley, and Mr. B. C. Allchin. The toast of 'The Club' was proposed by the Vice-Chancellor and responded to by Dr. C. H. Lloyd as first president, and the Principal of Brasenose as actual president. The idea of the dinner originated, we believe, with Dr. Allen, who carried out the arrangements with his usual energy.

The programme of music performed at the subsequent concert in the Club room was as follows:

The fact that the Vice-Chancellor of the University (The Rev. Dr. T. B. Strong, Dean of Christ Church) and the ex-Vice-Chancellor (the Principal of Brasenose) played a duet for two pianofortes is worthy of note. It is probably a unique occurrence. Their performance was highly appreciated and loudly applauded.

BACH'S LAST FUGUES.

By LAWRENCE HAWARD.

Of all the works of J. S. Bach the two which, if they cannot be said exactly to epitomise his attitude towards the Fugue, at any rate contain the most learned of all the examples of that form which he left behind him, are barely known by anything more than their titles. These two are the 'Musikalisches Opfer' and the 'Kunst der Fuge,' both of which were written at the end of his life. It is not altogether surprising that they should be little known, for, if we except the Sonata for flute, violin, and continuo in the first of these two works, and the eighth and eleventh Fugues in the second, the music consists of a series of exercises in technique or demonstrations of method, and can hardly be considered as coming into the same category as the big organ fugues, or the 'Forty-Eight,' which the composer made the means of the widest possible range of expression. Sir Hubert Parry puts it admirably when he says of them: 'They frankly present, with little æsthetical circumlocution, the methods of his fugal procedure. It is as though, having completed all his wonderful achievements in that form, he set himself to make a final exposition of his artistic creed, and to offer to the world some examples of pure fugal construction which would define and make plain the lines on which he had proceeded in making his works of art.' Another feature which differentiates both the 'Musikalisches Opfer' and the 'Kunst der Fuge' from his other fugal compositions is the fact that many of their component parts are not written for any particular instrument, and are not, indeed, intended for performance at all, but are simply abstract music for the eye alone, and in order to facilitate the reading, are written out in score. This is more particularly the case with the second work, which is more elaborate and more systematic in its demonstrations of the possibilities of fugal writing than the 'Musikalisches Opfer.'

'DAS MUSIKALISCHE OPFER.'

This work, as its title ('The musical offering') indicates, was a present, the recipient being Frederick the Great, whom Bach had recently visited at Potsdam, where his son, Philipp Emanuel, was installed as Kapellmeister in the King's suite. On this occasion the King had given a theme of his own to Bach to extemporise upon, and had also asked him to show him what he could do in the way of an extemporary fugue in six parts on one of the new Silbermann pianofortes. Even with the account of the incident given by Emanuel and by Friedemann, who was also present, it is not quite clear from the evidence whether the fugue in six parts which Bach invented was also on the King's theme or not; but however that may be, he resolved on reaching home to take up and work out more fully—'volkommen auszuarbeiten,' he says in the dedication—the theme which his patron had condescended to give him. He was not satisfied, he declared in the same prefatory dedication, with the way in which he had developed the subject at Potsdam, owing to the want of the necessary preparation for the task. The result of this combination of loyalty to the King and the desire to do himself justice was a series of canons and a sonata in four movements (probably intended for flute, violin and continuo) in addition to the original Fugue in three parts which he had improvised at Potsdam and the Fugue in six parts which may or may not be the same as the one he played on that occasion. The probabilities are that it is the same, not only because there is no allusion in the preface to its being a fresh composition, but also because it shows the same signs of being an improvisation as we find in the Fugue in three parts. That in fact is the main interest of these two Fugues. Even if we allow for Bach having to put on to paper what he had thought out on the spur of the moment some days previously, and perhaps for his correcting an imperfect passage here and there, we still have in these two works a record of his way of improvising in his old age. Beethoven, Mozart, Chopin, Franck, are all known to have been supremely gifted at improvisation, which in the 20th century is practically a lost art; but unless we count their Fantasias and Impromptus, which are really improvisations written down, we have no such faithful evidence of what they actually played as Bach has left us in this Musical Offering of his.

If we contrast the Fugue in six parts with the one in C sharp major in the first book of the 'Forty-Eight,' which is in five parts, or with any of the big organ fugues, we shall see how stiff it is in comparison, and lacking in emotional impulse and strong personal feeling. The main subject itself gains little in the course of its treatment, the secondary subjects are discarded after they have once been used, and the total result is frigid and rather mechanical though the mechanism is wonderfully ingenious. The Fugue in three parts is still more obviously the result of momentary inspiration rather than of hard concentration; the episodes without the subject are conveniently long, the main subject itself only recurs twice in an inner part; the treatment of subsidiary and counter-subjects is not strict; there is no stretto, and so on. But this very looseness of texture is one of the main charms of the work. We are given a glimpse of Bach expressing himself in his habitual terms but without much hard thinking; we seem to be overhearing his conversation rather than to be listening to one of his set speeches. Both this and the Fugue in six parts were given the other title of 'Ricercare' by Bach, as it supplied him with the acrostic inscription 'Regis Jussu Cantio et Reliqua Canonica Arte Resoluta.' Both were intended to be played on the keyboard, the six-part Fugue not being really more difficult than the Chaconne in comparison with his habitual writing for clavichord or violin. But although in the autograph this Fugue was written on two staves, Bach printed it for the sake of clearness in score. The canons are not meant to be played on any instrument, except perhaps the canon perpetuus for two parts by inversion over a free bass, which may be intended, like the Sonata, for flute, violin, and continuo. The others are more in the nature of musical games, the solutions of two of which were withheld by Bach with the playful indication, 'Quaerendo invenietis.' And over two of the others he has written (like some old contrapuntist of the Netherlands), punning Latin legends containing symbolical compliments to his patron. As to the Sonata, it is a dignified work in the Italian style with two noble slow movements and two brilliant Allegros. The writing shows care and concentration when one turns to it after the extemporised Fugue in three parts, and the feeling throughout is cold, more especially if one contrasts this trio with the earlier work in 'eight' for the same instruments. It is the only number in the Musical Offering which is based on material derived from Frederick's theme rather than on the theme itself.

'DIE KUNST DER FUGE.'

While Bach was engaged on this offering to the King, the idea occurred to him to work out in a still more elaborate form a series of fugues (also built on a single subject) which should be a practical illustration of this form of contrapuntal writing. If the former was a present to Frederick the Great we may look upon the latter as his legacy to posterity. Posterity, it must be admitted, has taken it very calmly. Even when Emanuel and Friedemann were alive not more than thirty copies of the first edition were sold, in spite of the eulogies of Mattheson and Marpurg, the leading critic and theorist of the day; and eventually the plates were disposed of for their value as so much copper. The public was less interested in fugues than it had been, and found no doubt that a series of sixteen of them, accompanied by four canons, was beyond its powers of endurance, more especially as the music was not intended to be played. Bach called them 'counterpoints' (the title 'The art of fugue' was not his) and wrote them out in score, though in one case he made an enlarged arrangement for two claviars of a fugue and its inversion, thus bringing everything within practical range of the keyboard for the sake of those who see better with their fingers than with their eyes. Every conceivable kind of contrapuntal device is resorted to in the course of the work, which might well be taken by lecturers and writers of text-books as a storehouse for their illustrations. The musical, as distinct from the purely technical, interest of the 'Art of fugue,' cannot, however, be said to be very great except in the case of three of the fugues—the eighth, the eleventh, and the unfinished fifteenth. The eighth and the eleventh have material in common, the three subjects of the former being worked out in the latter Fugue in four instead of in three parts. The tenth and the fourteenth Fugues also have matter in common in a different sense, for except for a passage of some twenty bars they are identical; but it is clear that Bach did not mean them both to be printed. He died before the engraving of the plates had been completed, and the two sons who saw the work through the Press did not stop to arrange the material in proper order or even to pay attention to Bach's own list of errata. This accounts for the insertion of the two versions of the fourteenth Fugue and for the addition at the end of the volume of the choral-prelude for organ, 'Wenn wir in höchsten Nöten sind,' which Bach dictated on his death-bed to his son-in-law, Altnikol. But it was not by mistake, as has generally been supposed, that the huge unfinished fragment known as the fifteenth Fugue was included with the others. Spitta is decisively of opinion that it does not belong to them, and so are Wilhelm Rust, who prepared the critical edition of it for the Bach Gesellschaft, and Moritz Hauptmann, who wrote a critical pamphlet on it; and both Schweitzer and Parry are negative, though Schweitzer suggests that the fugue may possibly have been added as a kind of appendix. Signor Busoni has, however, conclusively proved in his 'Choral-Vorspiel und Fuge über ein Bachsches Fragment' (Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel) that the unfinished Fugue was intended to be the Finale of the whole art of fugue, and the interest of the proof is that it is based, not upon documentary evidence, but upon purely musical reasoning.

The argument put forward by those who hold that the fragment does not belong to the collection runs thus: 'The whole point of the "Art of Fugue" is that each fugue should be based on the original theme or a derivative of it; the three subjects of this unfinished sketch do not include the original theme or a derivative of it; therefore the fifteenth Fugue does not belong to the "Art of Fugue."' The argument assumes that the Fugue was designed to be built on three subjects, and it is just this assumption which Busoni has shown to be unwarrantable. He has done it in this way: he has taken up the fragment at the point where it breaks off—that is to say, at the simultaneous entry of the three voices already introduced (the last of the three being a subject on the name BACH)—and after working the three together has added to them a fourth subject. This subject is nothing else than the chief theme of the 'Art of Fugue' on which all the previous fourteen are built, the very theme the absence of which was pointed to as an argument against the inclusion of the Fugue with the others. The working of the four subjects together has been carried out with masterly skill, but the chief interest, of course, of Busoni's completion of Bach's work is the fact that it shows that the fifteenth Fugue was undoubtedly designed to be the Finale of the 'Art of Fugue.' The introduction of the chief theme in fact finishes off the whole thing in an entirely logical and musically convincing way by summing up into a supreme climax everything that has gone before. A quotation to illustrate the combination of the four themes may be of interest:

Ex. 1.

Here the right-hand plays the subject of the second Fugue, the tenor part is the subject of the third Fugue (BACH), the second bass is the subject of the first Fugue, and the chief theme of the 'Art of Fugue' is given to the first bass. At the beginning Busoni has added a choral-prelude of his own on the subject, 'Allein Gott in der Höh' sei Ehr,' which in the second and enlarged version of the work, called a 'Fantasia contrappuntistica' (also published by Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel), returns at the end immediately before the stretto. The three other features which differentiate this enlarged version from the earlier one are the treatment of the chorale with harmonies which are entirely modern in feeling—the harmonies that we find in the pianoforte 'Elegies'; the insertion of three variations, also in modern tonality, on the name BACH, in the middle of the work so as to form an intermezzo between the third and fourth Fugues; and the introduction at one point in the Finale of the theme of the second of these interpolated variations, which comes in as a fifth voice simultaneously with the other four. An example set out in score will make this piece of counterpoint clear:

Ex. 2.

This 'Fantasia contrappuntistica' is intended as a study only, and is not meant for performance, though it has been played by Busoni at a private concert at Berlin. Arrangements of it have also been made (though not by Busoni) for organ and for orchestra. The orchestral version was to have been given at one of the Philharmonic concerts in 1913, but it had to be withdrawn at the last moment as sufficient time was not allowed to give it proper rehearsal. The fact that these arrangements have not been carried out by Busoni is due to his indifference to the medium employed. He has said of it himself, 'The "Fantasia contrappuntistica" is conceived neither for pianoforte nor for organ, nor yet for orchestra. It is music. The means of conveying the music in sound to the listener is of secondary importance.' It has been written, in fact, as a kind of 'Musical offering' to Bach. 'I thought,' Busoni says, 'I should be acting in the spirit of Bach by taking our art of to-day with its utmost possibilities as the organic development of his own, and turning it to the service of what he planned, just as he expressed himself with the utmost possibilities of the art of his time.' The Fantasia is of great interest to the student, but for those who do not feel that they can look on at this meeting of the new spirit and the old from quite the same point of view, the smaller version will be the one to which they will turn. That is not merely a fine piece of creative work in itself; it also offers a solution, on purely æsthetic lines, of a curious problem in musical history.

FOLK-SONGS.

BY EDMONDSTOUNE DUNCAN.

There was once a time when anyone walking into the country might have heard songs and ballads which people sang from sheer joyousness of heart,—tributes to the beauty of health and hope, of days and nights which brought forth a rich harvest of glad thought, thrilling the contented mind, and welling forth in liquid utterance, beside which the melody of birds was vain and artificial. Shakespeare's Pedlar not only vended such wares, he was also able to bear a part. Mopsa and he, with a shepherdess' help, and a new ballad before them, troll it out a prima vista, in a way that competitive sight-singers might envy. Nous avons changé tout cela; and although old songs of both town and country are still to be heard, the lover of folk-song must choose his ways carefully if he would be rewarded. Not many years ago the very existence of folk-song was seriously doubted. It was even scorned by the early historians. But it is now in high favour, and from being a luxury it has grown to a household word. The Society which directly patronises and preserves it can only boast of fourteen years' existence; yet its membership already enrolls the heads of the leading Colleges and Academies, with quite an array of University professors, musicians and critics. Books and MSS. before the time named did little to foster the movement. Nevertheless there existed a few undoubted folk-songs such as the traditional airs associated with Shakespeare, a handful of country dances of the 'Trenchmore' and 'Greensleeves' pattern, one or two isolated snatches of song like 'Westron Wynd' (in a 16th century Museum MS.), and a bundle of Christmas carols. We may accept or reject Lamb's 'vocal portraits of the national mind' as a satisfactory definition of folk-song or balladry, yet everyone has a shrewd idea that folk-music differs from the ordinary thing, inasmuch as it is traditional, and that no one can trace its precise origin. But whether or not behind each song there was an individual composer, who can be sure? Schlegel says there was; the Grimms held that such things grew by a common effort, like speech itself.

As everyday examples of what may be gathered in an afternoon's journey from Manchester, the following songs should prove of some interest. The first was sung by a huntsman, who knew no more of its history than that it had been handed down for generations and was a favourite with the craft. It was sung quietly, with a keen appreciation of its melody. Hills and vales seemingly took shape in the mind's eye; there was the swift rush of dogs, the race for life, with its inevitable end. Then one realised the snug celebration of the day's sport, its incense of tobacco and the healthy relish of rural cheer.

Ex. 1.

Bright beams ar-ray the fields at dawn, Hark, yon's the huntman's mer-ry horn, Who could not on so fine a morn A hunt-er's life en-joy? Oh, what a sight! 'Tis my de-light, To see brave hounds Frisk o'er the ground.
Hark! hark! hark! that's Throwler, There's Driver and there's, fow-ler, And Mu-sic and old Tow-ler, What a Repeat the Chorus.
mer-ry, mer-ry, jo-vial cry!

Now what's to do?

We're at a loss,
Perhaps he's skulking in yon moss,
Why casts he not his hounds across
For I know they'll hit her by.
Hark, hear you there,
Another cheer,
They're off again
Right up the lane.
It's hark, hark unto her,
See how they do pursue her,
Right up yon hill they view her,
What a merry, merry jovial cry.
Now she'll not last long,
Look o'er the lea.
They're viewing her hard
All down by yonder tree;
Run speedily
They'll tear her,
Run, hie thee, Ned,
Whoa dead, whoa dead.
Whoop! now it's all over,
They've kill'd her in yon clover,
By gum! she's been a rover,
With a merry, merry jovial cry.

The second and third songs came from a reaper in the fields: one who sang at his work, and scarcely seemed surprised that he should be asked to repeat so agreeable a diversion. His only regret was that he could not give more. We left him with his full-eared sheaves, a solitary figure, charming the lazy-footed hours with queer stanzas of song, some of which might have matched the quaint old church spire (peeping out in the distance) in point of age.

Ex. 2.

It's fare thee well to Glas-gow, Like-wise to Lan-ark shore, . . And fare thee well my bon-ny lass, I'll nev-er see thee more. . .

It's for the want o' pocket money
 And for the want o' cash
 Mak's many a bonny laddie
 Gar leave his bonny lass.
 For I am bound to go, my love,
 Where no one shall me know,
 And the bonny lassie's answer
 Will be Ay, no, no, no no.
 Will be Ay, no, no, no, my love,
 Will be Ay, no, no, no, no.
 I'll cut off my yellow locks
 And gang along with thee,
 And be thy faithful comarade
 In some foreign countree.
 Oh, stay at home, my bonny lass,
 And dinna gang awa,
 For little dost thou know
 Of the dangers of the war ;
 And the bonny lassie's answer
 Will be Ay, no, no, no, no.

Ex. 3.

once went to Law-ton to sweetheart a lass, Folks
 'Twas a land drab-ly road, and I went a gay shack; It said that the fa-ther 'ud see af-ter t'brass.

 CHORUS.
 Nay, not a bit of it, Nay, not I, I

Close to Manchester, and probably not many miles from its birthplace, the following ballad, none too nice in sentiment (of a type hawked in the streets half a century ago), was committed to paper just as it came from the mouth of an elderly songster who had a ready voice and a sure ear. Those who are conversant with the printed ballads, such as the famous collection which Halliwell gave to the Chetham Library, will know that such things were often written to any old air which fitted. No antiquity is claimed for the present piece ; yet it is certainly far from new :

Ex. 4.

On Mon-day morn-ing we broke down At th' fac-to-ry where I spin, So I went home; it were so fine, I could-na stop with-in, I drest me up in my se-cond best, put on my Sun-day shoon, CHORUS.
 And I took a walk up Old-ham Street, That
 With a fa la la la, fa la la la, fa
 Mon-day af-ter-noon.
 la la la fol ay.

I heard 'em say it were women's day
 So I thought I would just look o'er,
 I knew it were colliers' reckoning
 At t'Saturday neet afore.
 When I get there, there were nowt astir,
 But things did alter soon,
 For women coom rolling by dozens at once
 That Monday afternoon.

Owd women they were drest very grand
 But young uns grander still,
 And keys swung round on their fingers
 Like the sails of a windy mill.
 Old clothes shops they did surround,
 And pegs they laid bare soon,
 While Tom and me were working hard
 That Monday afternoon.

I watch'd their ways in the market place
 Until I were dry as a stick,
 And then I went to the Cheshire Cheese
 To see 'em pop in quick.
 They first popped in and then popped out
 With faces as red as the moon,
 And they smooth'd their lips quite unconcern'd
 That Monday afternoon.

At half-past five there were such a rush
 I shall never forget the shock,
 These women they flew like lightening,
 Shouting out it's six o'clock.
 Our Ben 'll be come when I get whoam,
 And then his clumsy shoon
 Ul come in contact with my poor shins
 This Monday afternoon.

One of the humours of ballad collecting is that time-honoured oral pieces, by act of transcription, tend to become copyright. Thus the writer, or the Musical Times, actually secures the copyright of the songs quoted (provided others have not gleaned in the same field) by the mere fact of publishing them. But the restriction is not so grave as it sounds, for no law in the land can hinder anyone from listening to my reaper, weaver, or huntsman, or from transcribing and publishing their songs. But they must first catch their hare. Law only says they must not snatch mine.

If musical readers will only be alert to ply pen or pencil, or to make judicious use of the phonograph, airs and ballads such as these will be found readily forthcoming throughout the North of England. Some of the country singers make one doubt whether folk-song is a thing even now quite dead, since they not uncommonly have an original composition or two up their sleeve.

THE INCOME TAX.

By J. F. R. STAINER.

The Income Tax, of which we are likely to hear a good deal shortly, is not, one would think, a theme that lends itself readily to musical treatment ; but it has been the subject of at least one song, a song written as long ago as 1800, by Charles Dibdin the younger, and sung by a Mr. Davis at Sadler's Wells in the course of a programme which was advertised in the daily Press as follows.

*Under the Patronage of His Royal Highness
The Duke of Clarence.*

Doors to be opened at half-past five, and begin at half-past six. Servants to keep places until half-past seven. The half-price admission at half-past eight o'clock.

One of the 'turns' introduced in 'Chaos, or Harlequin Phaeton,' was a 'Mock Italian Air by Mr. Dubois, accompanied on the salt-box by Mr. Grimaldi' (!).

A tax on income was still a novelty. It was first imposed in 1799, when the country was straining every nerve in the French wars, and Ministers were at their wits' end to devise new means of raising money. Wines, spirits, and tobacco had of course been laid under contribution. Taxes had been imposed on windows, wheels, taxed carts, horses, dogs, salt, glass, hats, clocks and watches, bricks and tiles, candles, and even hair powder, and as a last resort, on January 9, 1799, the Royal Assent was given to an Act 'to make more effectual Provision for the Prosecution of the War by granting certain Duties upon Income.'

Under this Act, incomes of £200 and upwards were taxed to the extent of one-tenth, or at the rate of 2s. in the £, and the point of Dibdin's song lies in the suggestion that this 'tenth' should be paid in kind, like the old ecclesiastical tithe. For incomes below £200 there were graduated rates of assessment down to incomes of from £60 to £65, which paid only 2d. in the £. Incomes below £60 were exempt. The country being in need of men as well as money, abatements were allowed for children born in wedlock, and these abatements, I observe, were on a rather more generous scale than those that have been allowed by a modern Chancellor. The tax was to be paid by six instalments on June 5, August 5, October 5, December 5, February 5, and April 5 in each year; and there being no provision for 'deduction at the source,' the tax collector called every two months for payment of the money!

No more need be said, I think, by way of introduction to the song except that 'the Minister' was Pitt, and that the word 'plum' in the fourth verse is or used to be commercial slang for a sum of £100,000. The music was published by Clementi & Co., Cheapside, but I am sorry to say that I have not been able to come across a copy of it.

'THE INCOME TAX.'

Ye quidnuncs so queer, who through politics trudge it
And mumble each crust of the Minister's budget,
Of all the various ways he discovered to link 'em,
Don't you think he did the job in the Tax upon Income?
Lord, how the great folks must come down with the
clinkum,
When the gem'man he goes round for the Tax upon Income.

'Twould be droll if this tax tythe-in-kind should be collected,
Then from lawyers, you know, justice couldn't be expected!
The proctors their payment in testaments they'd make it,
The doctors pay in physic—but who the deuce would take it?
I'll tell you who we'd give it to, 'twould save us all our
clinkum,
To the gem'man who goes round for the Tax upon Income.

Should the gem'man ask the barber's tythe, he'd lather him, mayhap, Sir,
The cobler too for tythe in kind would give his worship strap, Sir,
The baker'd give him short weight, when'er he chose to call, Sir,
Except the baker was churchwarden, then he'd give him
none at all, Sir,
For we know no more what churchwardens do with the
clinkum
Than the gem'man who goes round for the Tax upon Income.

Our cits are worth so many plums, our nobles too including,
Their contributions sure would make a national plum pudding,
Of which our foes to get a slice would try, ne'er doubt the question,
But they find our British dumplings too hard for their digestion,
And but for these, cooked by our tars, we'd have but little
clinkum
For the gem'man who goes round for the Tax upon Income.

May the incomes of the rich ne'er be taxed by venality,
But the incomes of the poor enlarged by their liberality;
May the tax of war's terrible outgoings cease, Sir,
And Britons be blest by the income of peace, Sir;
Till then may our tars make our foes find the clinkum
For the gem'man who goes round for the Tax upon Income.

Charles Dibdin, junior, the author of the song, was the elder of the two sons of Charles Dibdin, the famous writer of naval songs. He was born in 1768, the year in which his father made his first great hit as an actor in the part of Mungo in Isaac Bickerstaffe's play 'The Padlock,' and the boy was accordingly christened Charles Isaac Mungo. He was for many years manager and part proprietor of Sadler's Wells, and wrote a large number of songs and dramatic pieces for that theatre. He died in 1833. In 1807 a collection of his songs was published under the title 'Mirth and Metre.' Many of them were very popular, notably 'Abraham Newland' and 'Giles Scroggins.' He was the father of Henry Edward Dibdin, organist of Trinity Chapel, Edinburgh, who edited two well-known books of psalmody, The Standard Psalm Book (1857) and The Praise Book (1865).

On March 4 and April 1, Sir Frederick Bridge will complete a series of five lectures at the University of London, South Kensington, on 'Early efforts in opera.' The subjects on these two occasions will be Purcell's 'Dido and Æneas,' and 'The beggar's opera.'

BRITISH COPYRIGHT IN AUSTRALIA.

AN INJUNCTION GRANTED TO RESTRAIN THE IMPORTATION INTO AUSTRALIA OF BRITISH COPYRIGHT MUSIC REPRINTED IN THE UNITED STATES.

In our issue of April 1, 1913, we reported the result of an action at Ontario, Canada, in which the well-known firm of Messrs. Hawkes & Son, of London, were successful in obtaining a judgment against the firm of Whaley, Royce & Co., Limited, of Toronto, on the ground that the Toronto firm had imported into Canada, American printed copies of one of Messrs. Hawkes & Son's publications, one of Otto Langey's Tutors, which is copyright throughout all British territory, although it enjoys no copyright protection in the United States.

It was then explained that by the Law of Great Britain a British copyright enjoys protection throughout the British Dominions, and that the importation of foreign reprints of such works into British Territory becomes an infringement of British Copyright, notwithstanding that the actual reprinting of the works may be perfectly lawful in the country where they were manufactured.

In the Toronto action, Messrs. Hawkes & Son obtained an injunction, and costs, against the Toronto firm, who had imported copies from Carl Fischer, of New York.

Since April last, history has been repeating itself—this time in Australia; for we have before us the report of another action recently decided in the Supreme Court of South Australia, in which the facts were practically identical with those before the Court in the Canadian case, and the decision was the same.

In the Australian case the same enterprising firm, Hawkes & Son, were again the plaintiffs, and the unlawfully imported copies were again those reprinted by Carl Fischer, of New York. The defendant was Carl Engel, of Adelaide, whose firm had imported in wholesale quantities a considerable number of different Tutors by Otto Langey, all the copyright property of Messrs. Hawkes & Son.

It seems that early in 1912, Messrs. Hawkes & Son received information that the defendant was importing the Otto Langey Tutors into Adelaide from New York. Having proved this to be a fact by purchasing some of the unlawfully imported copies at Adelaide, Messrs. Hawkes & Son instructed their Australian solicitors, Messrs. J. Williamson & Sons, of Sydney, to take up the matter with a view to obtaining satisfaction, if possible, without taking the case into Court. Attempts to settle the matter amicably, however, failed, and Messrs. J. Williamson & Sons were ultimately compelled to issue a writ against Engel, through their agents at Adelaide. The defendant thereupon gave Messrs. Hawkes & Son's solicitors particulars as to the number of Langey Tutors he had imported from New York, but he sought to justify, or excuse, his action in so doing by urging that he did not know that the works were British copyrights, that Messrs. Hawkes had never informed him that the works were their copyrights, and that no one but Carl Fischer had claimed any copyright in them. He, nevertheless, offered to import no more copies of the works from America, and suggested that the action should be settled on those terms. As, however, Messrs. Hawkes & Son could obtain no corroborative evidence from Carl Fischer as to the number of copies purchased from him by the defendant, they declined to settle the matter out of Court.

The defendant then prepared to fight, and took all kinds of vexatious points in his endeavours to upset the plaintiffs' case. He wanted particulars of the claim, he applied for an order for inspection of documents, and he put forward a plea that the works were first published by Riviere & Hawkes, and demanded to see the assignment of each copyright from Riviere & Hawkes to Mr. Hawkes, the plaintiffs' father, when Mr. Hawkes bought Riviere's interest in the business. This was, of course, absurd, as when one partner purchases another partner's interest in a business all the copyrights and interests are transferred en bloc and not in detail. In consequence of the line of defence which the defendant was adopting, Messrs. Hawkes & Son threatened to put in a claim for heavy damages, and finally the defendant, having in June, 1913, obtained his order for particulars of the infringement and for discovery of documents, filed his defence in July, 1913.

Subsequently, however, the defendant seems to have thought that his case was not a very good one, and in September he consented to judgment being entered against him. We reprint the judgment verbatim below with the object of giving it the widest possible circulation, pour encourager les autres!

The case is important from every point of view, as within a period of six months Messrs. Hawkes & Son have obtained two judgments in two most important self-governing Colonies, which establish beyond question that it is just as dangerous to import into a British colony foreign reprints of British copyrights, as it is to reprint such works within the limits of the Colony itself.

THE NEW HARMONY.

'Bewildered' writes to us as follows :

'May I crave assistance from you or your readers? I read Mr. Leigh Henry's letter on Schönberg in a daily contemporary and straightway wrote a little piece. It is quite a nice little piece—a real psychological crisis, full of emotional potentialities and all that. Having accidentally reversed the sheet I read it al contrario verso and found it several ampères richer in dynamic soul-statics. So I wrote it out in the new form, and as my cosmic ego finds it difficult to retain for long the proximate apperception of such elusive entities my appreciative vision has failed me and, in plain English, I have got them mixed. Here are the two pieces. Can anyone tell me which is the original? * Perhaps Mr. Leigh Henry, Mr. Clutsam, or Mr. Ernest Newman would advise.'

The musical notation consists of four staves, each with a treble and bass clef. The first staff is marked 'Adagio.' and features a series of chords and single notes with a 'p' (piano) dynamic. The second staff is marked 'dol. iss.' (dolce, molto) and includes a 'cresc.' (crescendo) marking, with dynamics ranging from 'p' to 'f' (forte). The third staff is marked 'Adagio.' and begins with a 'f' dynamic. The fourth staff continues the piece with various chordal textures and a 'p' dynamic. The notation is dense, with many beamed notes and complex voicings.

[* We are glad to be able to relieve our agonised correspondent by stating that the veritable original is to be found in the Universal Edition, No. 5069 (copyrighted in 1913). It is quoted above by the kind permission of the publishers—ED., M. T.]

SCHÖNBERG EXPLAINED.

The letter alluded to by our correspondent appeared in the Daily Telegraph of February 7. Mr. Leigh Henry is the director of the School for the Art of the Theatre at Florence. After commenting on what he describes as the incoherent criticisms that followed the recent performance of Schönberg's Five Pieces, he suggests that the bewilderment of our most sincere critics is owing to their lack of constructive vision in regard to musical psychology. Then, after tracing briefly the evolution of psychological music through the path of programme music, he reveals the philosophy of the Five Pieces. He says :

And beside these we have Arnold Schönberg, one of the most subtle artists known to musical annals. Casting aside realism and all 'depiction' in a realistic sense, he takes the most intimate and subtle psychological influences of our complex modern existence, and not content with mere analysis, he strives also to give us the essence of their potentialities. Together with the culmination of every psychological crisis come a thousand results unborn and incapable of birth until that moment. So in his composition, 'Der Wechselnde Akkord,' we find not the mere exposition of the musical possibilities of a chord, but the statement of a psychological crisis given in such terms that one is instantly aware of the series of happenings which have built it up, and therefrom he strives to analyse the potentialities which such a crisis reveals and frees. So it is with the second piece, 'Vergangenes.' It is not only the past in the obvious sense, with all its poignant memories; it is the thousand barely discernible changes and subtle deepening of psychological perception which the more introspective outlook of life caused by increased complexity gains from the past. And for the last piece, 'Das Obligate Recitativ,' what more obvious symbol of its meaning could be found than Schönberg himself to-day? Here, surely, we have the solitary thought striving above the weight of common opinion and jarring it at every turn; so light, that at present it has lost touch with our grosser aspect, and can only work on our subtler nerves, which, being barely conscious, distress us by their unwonted agitation.

Church and Organ Music.

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

BY HARVEY GRACE.

V.—OF HOBBIES.

Possibly our Candid Friend exaggerated, after the manner of his kind. Nevertheless, there was some reason behind his rather sweeping statements, and his suggestions in the matter of examinations are less fantastic than they appear to be on the surface. But you shall judge. And to put these papers in tune with their title, let us occasionally adopt the dialogue form used by Old Izaak. Instead of Piscator, Venator, and Auceps—the garrulous trio who stretched their legs up Tottenham Hill on that ‘fine, fresh May morning’ nearly three hundred years ago—shall step out together we two, and the Candid Friend—Auctor, Lector, and Candidus.

Auctor.—Well met, good Lector, on this keen March morning. Whither away thus early?

Lector.—Give you a good day, Master Auctor, I go towards the fields at Charing, to clear my pipes in good air, and to take my morning draught at the ‘Chequers’ where, let me tell you, shall be gotten as noble an ale as any in the shere. But see, here comes friend Candidus. A fair meeting, Candidus, are you for a walk?

Candidus.—With all my heart; and by the way we will hold good discourse, I warrant you.

Auctor.—Agreed, good Candidus, and as Lector and I are players on the organ, and masters of the quiristers, and as you know much of those subjects (though, being withal a man of substance, you do not practise for hire), you shall open your mind about us and our work, more by token that, as hath been well said, lookers-on see most of the game.

Lector.—Do, Candidus. You shall find us good listeners and patient, so go not about the bush with us.

Candidus.—Marry, that will not I. By my fay, an I deal not roundly with you, may I never pour sack again! Have at you then! . . . But if you chaps think I am going to keep up this kind of jargon, you are mistaken. We have had the prologue in the right Walton manner. For the discourse, let it be ‘go as you please.’ And for text, I shall take a subject on which you organists need hortating: your absorption in your own branch of musical work, and neglect of outside interests,—in a word, your ‘grooviness.’

Auctor.—Why, my dear fellow, how can you,—

Lector.—Really, Candidus, I am surprised,—

Auctor.—We may have our faults, but,— Lector.—Yes, surely, that is not one of them!

Auctor.—Look at the lectures we attend!

Lector.—And the musical journals we read!

Auctor.—And the Organists’ Associations,—

Lector.—Yes, springing up all over the country.

Candidus.—Piano! Piano! Let me try to make out my case. To begin with, I admit that the nature of your work tends to narrow your outlook. Year after year you must inevitably travel the same round: responses, chants, hymns, anthems,—altogether hundreds of familiar items must be gone through each year. And to make matters worse the bulk of this music is necessarily of a more or less conventional character, though you must not suppose that I use the term ‘conventional’ in a derogatory sense. The average member of your profession—and bear in mind that throughout I have in my mind only the average organist, who, because he makes up the majority and is usually the chief musician of his district, has considerable responsibilities in the way of influence—the average organist, I say, has little chance of adding to this repertoire. In the matter of organ music much the same state of things obtains. He does not make his living by playing difficult organ music. His main income is derived from his work as general practitioner. Therefore he goes the round of the organ music he learned in his early days, when he had more time for practising. The more modern school of organ music he rarely has time to study. There is something to be said for his attitude, on utilitarian grounds. Why should he spend time learning difficult music by Reger, Karg-Elert, and Company, which when played is mostly in an idiom not understood of the people? So he sticks to his classics with, for modern work, something that shall make small demands on player and listener. His attendances at concerts are few and far between, for the reason that his evenings are usually filled up with lessons or class work. In smaller provincial towns he has the further disadvantage of rarely hearing any other organ or choir than his own, and if a concert takes place he generally bears a more or less important part in it. Then, unless he is on his guard, the tide of art goes on and leaves him high and dry. Perhaps no other musician runs the risk to such an extent. The orchestral player is constantly in touch with the greatest of music, classical and modern. The professional singer must now be prepared to take part in choral works other than Handel and Mendelssohn, and even in cases where no great variety of work is undertaken, vocal soloists have the bracing experience of constantly singing before fresh audiences, and under different conductors and conditions. Meanwhile, the organist is tied to his church, and goes on his narrow round of service, choir-practice, and lessons. Is it any wonder that his mental and musical outlooks become narrow? What is he to do if he is not to be strangled by his environment?

Lector.—We have quite a lot of organists’ associations.

Candidus.—Good; and what happens when they meet?

Lector.—Somebody reads a paper on some musical subject, and the meeting discusses it.

Candidus.—Not quite so good, that. Organists’ associations, if they take a man from his little corner in the world, even if it be only at monthly or quarterly intervals, and drop him among comparative strangers to rub shoulders with and see that there are other points of view than his own, do a good work. But you say that the subject dealt with at meetings is usually a musical one. There, I venture to think, is where the associations are making a mistake. What the average organist needs is not more music, but more outside interests. The compleatest organist is he who is also in constant touch with at least one of the kindred arts. Your associations would be even more useful if they led to gatherings of organists listening with rapt attention to papers on architecture, painting, or literature. They would be shocked if one suggested a political discussion, but I am sure many cobwebs would be cleared away, and the members would return to their daily round braced, after a well-managed debate on Ulster, Tariff Reform, or some social question. For one thing, they would realise how small a part, after all, their art plays in the scheme of things.

Auctor.—Why, music is a most civilizing,—

Lector.—Ars longa,—you know, all that sort of thing.

Candidus.—All that sort of fiddlesticks! Music is just one of the trimmings of life,—a very pleasant one, perhaps the purest and best of all the trimmings, but at present, so far as popular appeal is concerned, of infinitely less importance than the picture show, variety theatre, or professional football. If you and your music disappeared to-morrow, the world would pitch a wreath after you, and go about its business and pleasure much as usual. However, this by the way. What I want you to realise is the fact that the organist at present is too often an organist only. He forgets that his organistship is a detail. He is, before all else, a man in a world of men and women,—especially women! Reverting for a moment to your organists' associations, when they meet for musical discussion what is the kind of subject usually chosen? Too often it is one with which they already have, or should have, full acquaintance—the training of choirs, organ playing, that standing dish, congregational singing, and so on. If musical subjects be chosen, let them deal with a branch of the art with which the organist is likely to have little to do,—chamber music, opera, modern harmonic tendencies, and the like. But best of all, as I said, drop music altogether on such occasions, and meet for consideration of other subjects, or for social intercourse,—always being careful that the latter does not end in the association becoming a Mutual Admiration Society. A Mutual Recrimination Society would be much more interesting, and really not without its uses.

Lector.—I don't think the change would be popular.

Candidus.—Very likely not, but organists, as well as other folk, have sometimes to be saved from themselves. We laugh at the busman who spent his holiday riding on another 'bus. If you had taken him by the scruff of the neck and made him take a long walk or play a game of bowls instead, he would probably have given you a liberal helping of the vocabulary for which he was famous, but he would have driven his 'bus all the better next day, and in the long run would have thanked you. And the mention of bowls reminds me that organists, because they are debarred from cricket and football on account of the risk to fingers, too often play no games at all. Tennis and its winter brother, badminton, are the very games for the organist who is still on the right side of old age; while bowls, golf, boating, walking, billiards, and (for such as can conquer their repugnance to putting the worm on the hook, which I, for my part, never could) fishing, are available for such as prefer less violent forms of recreation. Holidays, again. There is a pestilent custom springing up of late years of musicians spending their holidays in talking shop, and generally setting the musical world to rights. If you ask me what is the best holiday for a musician, I would say, let him go off with two or three other men who are not musical. An organist who spent a month camping with a lawyer, a doctor, and an inspector of weights and measures, all of whom were in the happy condition of scarcely knowing one tune from another, would come back to work avid, and knowing many more things than he did before he set out. In musical matters, every organist should be proficient in some branch other than that by which he boils the pot. It would do him a world of good to join an orchestral society, or a madrigal choir, and take his place in the rank and file,—he, who is so accustomed to be on his hind legs all the time directing others. His organ playing will gain in the matter of phrasing if he can sing, or play the violin, his perception of rhythm will be developed by even occasional playing of timpani. But above all, he should be a reader of books, and especially poetry and other works from which the imaginative side of him might draw some sustenance. A musician who is not a Browningite is to me a contradiction in terms. One who has never read 'Abt Vogler!'—Let me quote a few lines from the same poet's 'Shop':

... And so did day wear, wear, till eyes
Brightened apace, for rest was earned;
He locked door long ere candle burned.
And whither went he? Ask himself,
Not me! To change of scene, I think.

Because a man has shop to mind
In time and place, since flesh must live,
Needs spirit lack all life behind,
All stray thoughts, fancies fugitive,
All loves except what trade can give?

I want to know a butcher paints,
A baker rhymes for his pursuit,
Candlestick-maker much acquaints
His soul with song, or, haply mute,
Blows out his brains upon the flute!

We may not be anxious to decorate our walls with the results of the butcher's painting, but he will be the better butcher for his hobby. To the mere butcher a round of beef is just so much fat and lean food, to be disposed of as quickly as possible. To the butcher-painter it is something more, and in the customary slap of his broad knife with which he bids it farewell, there will be a lurking appreciation of its colour-scheme,—a pretty arrangement of red and white that he feels needs a more skilful brush than his to do justice to.

Lector.—Oh! I say! Really, you know! a mere butcher thinking of a bit of beef in that way!

Candidus.—Why not? If it brings into his work an element that helps him to regard his work as something more than a mere money-making operation, is he not likely to be the better man for it? Being a better man, is he not inevitably a better butcher? When I can find such an one, he shall have my custom.

Auctor.—But surely things in our profession are much better than they were twenty years ago. Then an organist was an 'outsider.' Socially, his position is much improved.

Candidus.—Yes, but why? Mainly because his duties are more important and better paid. He is still far from being a complete social success, because he can as a rule talk on no subject but music. I am glad to see that the Royal College of Organists recognises the importance of widening the organist's outlook, by including a literary test. But this hardly goes far enough. Too often the subjects are musical. Occasional excursions have been made in the work of Ruskin, but inasmuch as the examinee knows beforehand what book his two hundred words essay is to deal with, it is merely a test in writing fair English. This is good. But how much better it would be if every candidate went up prepared to answer questions on English literature generally! This is not asking too much. Any man who claims to be even fairly educated should be able to meet such a catechism with no special preparation. I recently amused myself with drawing up some examination questions, which I am sure would brighten the syllabuses of some of our examining bodies.

They are of course not to be taken too seriously, but you will agree with me that the candidate who could answer most of them off-hand would be none the worse musician for the fact, and would certainly be a better companion in non-musical circles:

- (1) Who was Diogenes Teufelsdröck? In what book do we read of him? Translate his second name.
- (2) Say briefly what you think of Mrs. Battle's opinions on her favourite game. What feature in a rival game did she condemn as vulgar?

- (3) What were the palmy days of Surrey Cricket? Critically compare the batting styles of (a) Hobbs, (b) Hayes, and (c) 'Razor' Smith.
- (4) What are your opinions on (a) the l.b.w. rule, and (b) the future of googly bowling?
- (5) Have you read 'John Christopher'? If so, describe his attitude towards the modern French School.
- (6) If not, why not?
- (7) Briefly compare (a) Shaw, Chesterton, and Belloc, (b) Hall Caine and Marie Corelli, and (c) Sam McVea and Bandsman Blake.
- (8) What is your opinion of the transfer fee? Describe its effect on Southern League Clubs.
- (9) Give as briefly as possible your views on (a) Syndicalism, (b) Vegetarianism, (c) Kikuyu, and (d) The future of the London tramway system.
- (10) Who is Melville Gideon? Take the first phrase of what you believe to be his most popular composition; (a) invert it, augment it, put it in the tenor, and add four free counterpoints to it, (b) restore it to its original form, and combine it with 'My mother bids me bind my hair'; (c) add to these two themes three folk-songs, making a quodlibet.

There! a man who could make a fair show with that paper, is not likely to get into a groove, and will be able to keep his end up in most circles.

Auctor.—I think you expect too much, though there is a little grain of truth at the bottom of it all.

Candidus.—A grain! There's a solid lump of it that it will do you good to hit your thick head against. But here we are at the 'Chequers,' well breathed, and ready for the noble ale Lector spoke of. We will take a draught to our next merry meeting.

Auctor. ; —Merry!

THE REFORM OF CHURCH MUSIC: SOME REFLECTIONS ON THE MORNING POST CORRESPONDENCE.

BY J. LIONEL BENNETT.

Church music has for so long been a favourite field in which the amateur critic may take his cheerful fling, that the professional musician is apt to pass over with quiet contempt any correspondence on that subject. The doctrines enunciated in such controversies have also generally been so various, so contradictory, and so unrelated to any urgently or widely felt need, as most effectually to secure that everything should go on exactly the same as before. The recent correspondence in the Morning Post has, however, been noteworthy not merely because there have intervened in the discussion some musicians of commanding authority, but because, whatever contraries and extravagancies of opinion have found expression, there has emerged a certain consensus of authoritative judgment that there is a genuine need for some careful reform. Which being interpreted means, for the practical musician, that despite the violence of language and obvious musical insufficiency of some of the more ardent 'reformers,' they yet have hold of a certain something of truth which the professional musician will do well to get a grip upon; and the more so as, if the reforming temper spreads, much music of pure truth and beauty may ere long stand in need of prompt and determined defence. Church music stands to suffer from the narrow-mindedness of the ill-informed every bit as much as from the debased tastes of the vulgar.

It will not have escaped notice that some of the most eager and uncompromising champions of reform are clergy; which suggests the reflection that the movement is not a purely musical one, however musically important its aims. Nor is it just an excursion of Medievalists versus Moderns. It is in the main the outcome of a conviction which has for a long time been slowly spreading and gathering force amongst earnest and musically sensitive (though perhaps musically ignorant) clergy: That a good deal of the music which the Wesleyan and Tractarian revivals brought into being is not what is most needed to-day. The warmth, fervour, and tenderness which were a beautiful and natural expression in the reaction from the spiritual coldness and deadness of the 18th century, are by no means always morally helpful to a much more emotional, easy-going, and self-indulgent generation in which discipline in the home, in social relations, and in public life, is ever being more and more relaxed. This must not be read as a little bit of a sermon which has somehow worked loose from my pulpit in North Devon, and been carried by some mischievous imp into the columns of the Musical Times. It is not intended as a bit of preaching, but simply as defining a position, or a point of view which only needs to be stated clearly to secure the kind consideration of the professional musician. Amongst the music thus referred to there is, of course, much of excellence, high beauty, and permanent value: it only needs using with some discrimination. But there is also much about which no good thing can be said. And to the parish priest there has come, now here, now there, the discovery (through experiences which leave him no room for doubt), that there is a definite and serious risk to ill-balanced and undisciplined characters when they are constantly given a hotch-potch of highly emotional, tenderly sentimental, and even trivial and vulgar music to sing and listen to in their worship.

The 1904 edition of 'Hymns A. & M.' and the 'English Hymnal' represent the impulse of an awakened clerical consciousness, every bit as much as they represent the judgment of the musical experts responsible for them. From dealing with hymns an endeavour will almost certainly be made, and possibly at no distant date, to deal with our Church music generally in the interest of a sterner and loftier muse. Already we have had a plea for a Church Music Board 'for the suppression of the undesirable,' eloquently pressed by Mr. F. E. Barrett. This proposal, if one may judge from the Morning Post correspondence and from such letters as that of Prof. Hadow, at once awakened misgivings in the minds of some who were most eager for such reform as presumably Mr. Barrett had in view. And misgivings deepened and multiplied as one faced the question: 'How many of our lay musicians, how many of our clergy, have the profound musical learning, large sympathy, and thorough knowledge of ecclesiastical music and liturgy requisite for the formation of a board armed with disciplinary powers?' If a merely advisory board were made, there would be need that its first function should be to learn and study rather than venture too soon to give advice. Church music is a big subject; it is particularly so, and correspondingly difficult, in the case of a Church whose formularies, ritual, and practice leave open as wide as possible the way of freedom.

Archdeacon Gardner, in his letter which rounded off the Morning Post correspondence, indicated the first fact which has to be faced in any move towards reform, when he postulated that the Cathedral in each Diocese is the proper centre from which reforming influence should emanate. Truly, it should be in our Cathedrals that a learned order of Church musicians should be found, for there are the Church's great musical posts for priests and laymen. But nowadays the precentorships are generally either honorary posts held by residentiary canons, who would be the first to deny the soft impeachment of possessing musical learning, or they are held by minor canons whose musical knowledge is, with most rare exceptions, so slight and amateurish that the less said of it the better. They have just a control over the music list (a control grievously influenced by the impatience of canons to get back to their work—or home to tea !); and that, generally speaking, is the sum total of the musical power they wield, or are in any small degree competent to wield.

On the other hand, the highly-trained and often highly-gifted Cathedral organist,—admirable and devoted servant of the Church as he usually is,—is really, as regards his learning, a secular musician rather than an ecclesiastical one; for on its ecclesiastical side his equipment is as strangely incomplete as on its secular side his musical experience is circumscribed.

The musical ignorance of the clergy, which Sir Charles Stanford has declared to be the fons et origo mali of our troubles, is the first fact which has to be faced. And somehow or other the clergy, and especially the superior clergy, have got to be made aware of it, and not only aware of it but ashamed of it. To expect the average heavily-burdened parish priest to be something of a master-in-music in addition to a lot of other things, would be absurd. But it may fairly be urged that our Church should require that those of her clergy who hold, or would qualify for, definitely musical posts, entailing responsibility for the choral worship of a great cathedral or big parish church, and the command of a highly-trained choir and, possibly, a distinguished musician as organist, shall be as deeply learned and competent for their task as the best of her divinity lecturers, or parish priests, or bishops, are efficient in their several lines. At present most of us musical clergy (alas ! I must include myself in this condemnation) have perforce to treat as a precious hobby for leisured moments the great and sacred Art, which our Church might well require us to make the endeavour of our lives. For, whilst Sir Charles Stanford's diagnosis of the fons et origo mali may be accepted as correct, the remedy to which he seems to point, when he complains of the 'amateur clinging to a worn-out tradition of power,' is a very questionable one. To transfer to the layman the priest's control over the music is almost certainly neither desirable nor possible. What is needed is that the holder of spiritual office should be competent to exercise his authority as priest-musician and to 'know his job.' The lay professional and the musically-learned priest have their several functions, and the one is the counterpart of the other; and it may safely be said that the average professional musician does not eye with disfavour the controlling power of the cleric, but most loyally accepts it as in the natural order of things. What he feels to be not in order is the cleric's often profound ignorance of music in general, and of Church music in particular, and his deplorable attitude towards it. If, in a Cambridge College Chapel, Sir Charles Stanford, with all his weight of learning and authority, found himself baffled by lack of knowledge on the part of his ecclesiastical superiors, what can the average musician hope for in less favoured places? Sir Charles Stanford has finely stated the case for music in these his words: 'It has to be brought home to the Church that she has her duties to her chief handmaid music . . . that . . . simplicity need not take the form of vulgarity; that the responsibilities of the cathedrals and larger churches are commensurate only with the value of the great works which have been their glory for centuries.'

For the right and faithful use of the Church's glorious heritage of song, past, present and to come, we need the recovery of a proper order of musically and liturgically learned clergy, and the restitution to them of those musical dignities, precentorships, major canonries, &c., which the Church before the Reformation, and for some time after, reserved for her men of music. One who has had his modest share of cathedral life and work, with its joys of a glorious organ to play and a large-hearted choir to teach, and is too much a lover of Arcady to desire any return to residence in a Cathedral Close, may perhaps be permitted to raise this plea for music's sake and for those who shall come after.

Meanwhile let reformers in their zeal, and anti-reformers in their content, bear in mind that in music, as in other things divine, God has not left Himself without witness in any age. Whether it be some Plainsong chant stealing forth from Saxon shrine, or leisurely meditative strain of German-Latin hymnody, or Lutheran melody thundering its way through street and market-place, or English or French Psalm-tune enclosed in harmony purely wrought—there is beauty from every age, and in every various form, whether the form be a Palestrina motet with its perfectly ordered way, or one of those exquisite miniatures by Gibbons, or modern anthem, or hymn, or chant. And what do they know, what can they know, who talk contemptuously of the Cathedral school of music? The whole Cathedral school, from Tallis to Stanford—who shall tell the beauty and the truth of the things that are written here, whatever of poorer work may intermingle? Yet what is the average cathedral congregation allowed to hear, e.g., of the beauty of Byrde, the pathos of Pelham Humfrey, the excellence of Boyce at his best, or, to come to modern times, the splendid genius of S. S. Wesley? What more thrilling than Wesley's outbursts of sheer magnificence, when he will have the organ assert its sovereignty? What poetry more fair than his when in contemplative mood his spirit mounts, and lifts the listener, upon the soaring song of boys' clear voices above his earthly chorus, up and up from the clinging discords that seem to unclasp their hold with the tenderness of regret? ('early in the morning will I direct my prayer unto Thee, and will look up. . . . They that love Thy Name shall be joyful in Thee.'—Small wonder that Wesley held this anthem of his to his heart!) Or again, how simple and how true when, in his 'Wilderness,' after the great vision of final redemption he brings us back to earth and present realities, and, as it were, stands his messenger on high to sing, as an Angel might sing to souls pain-ridden, the promise of better things to come, in an utterance whose poignancy is sometimes almost more than one can bear. Yet even this composer, whose music is so understandable and so true, whose tenderness never degenerates into mere sentimentality, whose splendour is never mere display, is allowed no fair hearing. Cut up into stupid little samples or selections, his finest anthems are robbed of all their deeper message, and their whole musical raison d'être defied. Week after week the faithful suffer a twenty or thirty minutes' sermon which is not always the purest wisdom or the freshest. Will not Deans and Canons be gracious and let us sometimes listen for ten or fifteen minutes, even on a week-day evening (for it is only on week-days that parochial clergy and country people can get to a Cathedral service), while one of the Church's great poets speaks to us in a language that is fairer than speech? And may we not fitly be seated, as during the reading of Scripture, save when there is a direct ascription of praise to God?

Hard things have been said of late concerning the work of some who are no longer with us. Without any extenuation of trivial and unworthy music, the modest but firm opinion may be ventured that when all is said that most justly may be said, there stands to the credit of such workers as Stainer, Monk, and Dykes, a certain output which, judged by the canons of oldest musical criticism, is perfectly clean and sound. By all means let us cast out the false, but let us hold to the true, and let us not be ungrateful. If from the abomination of desolation exemplified in some neglected or half-derelict meeting-house we pass in to the inspiring worship at St. Paul's Cathedral, we have a measure of what the Church in London, and in England, owes to John Stainer. One must not exaggerate: there were others, and clergy, with him; but he was the main interpreter, and often the inspirer, of their dreams. It is easy for superior persons now, or whom he showed the way and held the torch, to sneer at 'Stainerised Merbecke' and so forth, but it is not very intelligent. And who laboured more assiduously to degrade his genius, and the genius of others, his fellows, than we clergy with our insistent demand for the 'effective,' 'taking,' and 'bright'? We, of all people, ought to be able to retrieve our errors without having recourse to the unlovely method of turning and rending, with scarcely-bridled tongue, those who gave us the pretty pearls which we insisted on being fed with. Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis—and if we can serve the needs of our own generation as well as those eager-hearted musicians served the special need of their own time or rather, that need as apprehended by the clergy who were the people responsible for its true apprehension) we, when we pass out, shall have some right to hope that human kindness will deal gently with us and ours, whilst it blots out our mistakes and the work that proves not worth keeping.

To use and prize aright our heritage of song; to learn to know the evil and to choose the good; to curb the haste and temper of reforming zeal which often obviously knows very little of the treasures that are ours, and lacks the technical training to pass sound judgment upon what it does know; to shake out of its content the perilous ignorance of those who think that there is nothing to reform, and that there is no music worth doing but that with which they happen to be familiar; to shake still more the shameful conception of Church music as merely an attraction—a sort of pretty rattle to lure the congregational baby to church; there is our task, or the beginnings of it. We have a zeal to learn, and we musical clergy most of all.

[By kind grace of the Editor I am permitted to add that the MS. of this article was in his hands some time before the publication of Dr. Alcock's very interesting review in last month's Musical Times. T. BEES' PRIORY CHURCH: T. A. WALMISLEY CENTENARY.

On Sunday, January 25, the centenary of Thomas Attwood Walmisley's birth was celebrated at St. Bees' Priory Church. The whole of the Canticles and Psalms for the day were sung to his chants. At the evening service his anthem 'Not unto us' was given. Mr. F. J. Livesey, the organist and choirmaster, played as a voluntary Walmisley's only published organ work—the Prelude and Fugue in C minor.

At a meeting of the Hampshire Association of Organists, held at Winchester on January 17, Dr. William Prendergast (the President) read a thoughtful and ably-written paper on 'The use of Church music now and in the past.' An interesting feature was a sturdy advocacy of Stainer's music. He said: 'Those who profess to admire the purely contrapuntal school at the expense of that of modern times sometimes sneer at the "sentimentality" of the music of Victorian writers, especially that of Stainer. Few people have done more real good for Church music than John Stainer. A man of his skill, endowed with a devout and tenderly human nature, was needed to breathe the spirit of life upon the dry bones of Cathedral music at the time he began his career, and he set a splendid example in the way in which he discovered hitherto unrealised founts of beauty in the works of the great composers, and by writing music which, if not elaborate, is of an intensely religious character. "Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" Call Stainer's music cheap and empty if you will, but is there no pearl concealed in the simple strains, for instance, of that little anthem, "What are these that are arrayed in white robes?" which, sung as it should be, goes straight to the heart; or in the phrase "and to guide our feet into the way of peace," in his E flat Benedictus? Are there many works of the great Elizabethan period which can bring about a like result?—Whilst it is true that there is much that is fine and noble which first saw light in the 17th century, the mere fact that it belonged to that age is not in itself sufficient to warrant its use to-day.'

Mr. Russe (Bournemouth) said he was particularly pleased to hear Dr. Prendergast speak up for 'dear old Sir John Stainer.' Mr. Chandler (Bournemouth) said that Stainer had immense influence, and it was 'not going too far to say that he started Church music again—gave it new life.' Mr. Cook (Southampton) spoke in a similar strain.

Mr. Seymour Pile, organist of St. Peter's Parish Church, Petersfield, informs us that he has at his residence an organ which is the work of Father Smith (Schmidt). It is in a beautiful oak case about 8 feet high, and is in playing order, the diapason tone being excellent. It has a very rare stop in it, a wood mixture of three ranks. The keyboard is typical of the time, black keys (white) and white sharps—a G organ. Every stop speaks, and it is all playable.

The Father Willis organ at Cardiff Parish Church has been renovated and improved by the original builders, Messrs. Henry Willis & Son, and an electric installation has been put in by the Rotasphere Company. The alterations have been carried out under the supervision of the organist, Mr. G. H. Cole.

The Feast of the Purification was observed as the Patronal Festival at St. Mary the Virgin, Tottenham. Dr. William A. Hall's sacred Cantata, 'The Presentation in the Temple' (specially composed for this Church), was performed with orchestral accompaniment under the composer's baton. The solo parts were sustained by Miss Mabel Manson, Mr. Webster Millar, and Mr. Charles Rule. Mr. T. H. J. Large presided at the organ.

A recital of Russian a cappella music was given on January 28 by the Æolian Choir, Brooklyn, at the Central Congregational Church. Fifteen choral pieces were sung, the composers being Tchaikovsky, Kastalsky, Nikolsky, Bortniansky, Gretchaninov, Tschesnokov, Rachmaninov, Schvedov, and Pavlov.

At the House of Laymen, Church House, Westminster, on February 17, Mr. Royle Shore gave a demonstration to illustrate a practical scheme of Church Music Reform by which it is proposed to standardize suitable music, ancient and modern, for use of the people, with or without the help of a choir, and to propagate its acceptance.

The Rev. Walter Marshall, joint author, with Mr. Seymour Pile, of the 'Barless Psalter,' gave a lecture on Psalmody and the methods laid down in that book, at St. Paul's Chapter House, on February 18.

A presentation, in the form of a gold watch, was made on February 17 to Mr. B. J. Bowen, organist and choirmaster of Trinity Presbyterian Church, Middlesbrough, as a mark of appreciation of his twenty-five years of service.

We have received programmes of the nineteen organ recitals given by Mr. A. E. H. Nickson at the Church of St. Peter, Melbourne, during the year 1913. In every case but one a work of Sigfrid Karg-Elert was performed.

A fund is being raised at Manchester for placing a memorial tablet to the late Benjamin St. J. B. Joule, a well-known Manchester organist, in Holy Trinity Church, Hulme.

A complimentary dinner was given on February 5 to Mr. B. Nock, organist and choirmaster at St. Paul's Church, Leamington.

EARLY BODLEIAN MUSIC: VOL. III.

Early Bodleian Music. Introduction to the Study of some of the Oldest Latin Musical Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library, Oxford. By E. W. B. Nicholson, Bodley's Librarian. With seventy-one colotype facsimiles.

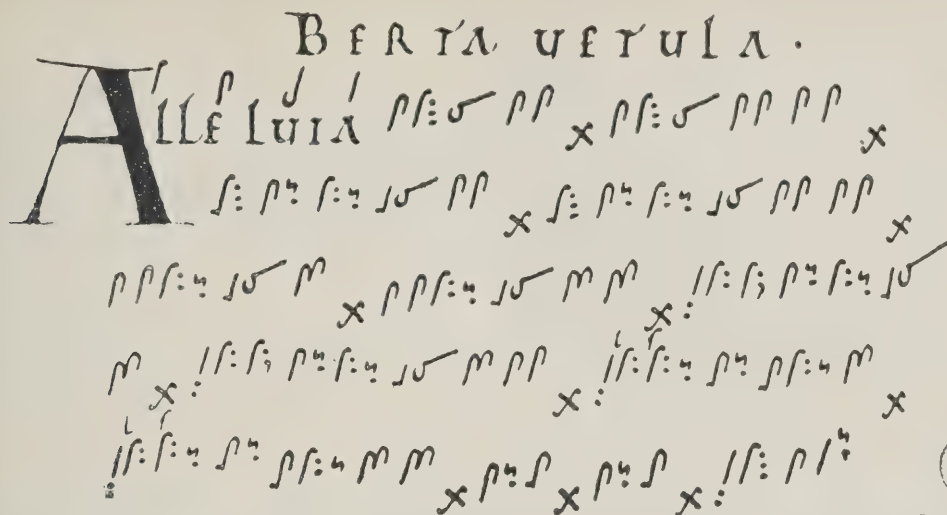

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This sumptuous volume marks the completion of the late Sir John Stainer's scheme for the publication of all manuscript secular music in the Bodleian Library dating from before 1500 A.D. The first two volumes were published in 1901, shortly after Sir John's death, and contained 110 facsimiles of musical manuscripts ranging in date from 1185 to 1505 A.D., with transcriptions into modern notation. A few secular or semi-secular pieces of still earlier date, written in neums, were omitted because they could not be transcribed with any certainty. Until a late period of their use neums were ordinarily written without any stave and without any pitch-signature. They served, no doubt, to refresh the memory of a singer who was already familiar with the melody, but to anyone who was not familiar with it they can have conveyed only the vaguest outline of the rise and fall of the music. It is only when the melody can be traced in a later stave notation that any certain meaning can be extracted from early neums.

For these reasons no music written in neums was admitted to the first two volumes. Mr. Nicholson, however, had already devoted a good deal of time to the study of the paleography of these earlier MSS., and it was arranged that his investigations should be continued and eventually published, with additional facsimiles, as a separate volume. Now, after the lapse of twelve years, during which Mr. Nicholson's work was interrupted more than once by serious illness, and finally brought to an end by death, the result of his investigations is before us in an elaborate introduction to a series of facsimiles dating from the 7th to the 13th centuries.

The neums, it must be observed, are not necessarily of the same date as the manuscript in which they occur. They are not likely to have been inserted before the text was written, but they may very well have been added afterwards. The oldest neums hitherto known date from the 9th century, and Mr. Nicholson has not come across any in the Bodleian Library that can with certainty be attributed to an earlier date. In the early part of the 7th century we have the definite statement by Isidore of Seville that 'nisi ab homine memoria teneantur soni pereunt, quia scribi non possunt' ('sounds perish unless they are retained in the memory of man, for they cannot be written'), and it is probable that neums did not come into general use before the end of the 8th century. There had, of course, been systems of alphabetic notation in classical times, but in the Latin Church, at any rate, these had fallen into disuse, and had not been replaced by any other.

In this volume, then, the oldest neums are not to be found in the oldest MSS., and in fact the neums in the 7th century manuscript with which Mr. Nicholson's series of facsimiles begins were added at least four hundred years later. From the 9th century onwards, however, there are to be seen in the facsimiles examples of neums in every stage of development. At first they are very simple in character and written all on one level, without any indication of rhythm or pitch. Then they are found with 'Romanian letters,' added to give some idea of pitch and phrasing, those most commonly employed being e for equaliter and l for levare. Then we come to spaced or 'diastematic' neums, where variation of pitch is shown by variation in the level at which they are written, and finally to neums disposed in relation to one or more lines, which are made to indicate pitch by colour or by the addition of clef signatures, or by both.

Neums are not the only form of notation illustrated. Facsimile No. xvi. shows the original of a hymn to St. Stephen in two parts, written towards the end of the 11th or early in the 12th century in an alphabetic notation in which, apparently, all the letters of the alphabet from A upwards could have been used, though the actual music only ranges between C and N. The following is the transcription of the opening phrase given by Mr. Wooldridge in the 'Oxford History of Music':

Mr. Nicholson's Introduction is for the most part a paleographical study, the aim of which is to ascertain as nearly as may be the date and provenance of the various manuscripts. He makes no attempt to transcribe the music or to trace the history of particular liturgical melodies. Nevertheless, certain facts and conclusions of the highest interest to students of musical history do emerge and call for notice in a musical periodical.

The first of these relates to the origin of the music in the 'Winchester Troper,' of which there are manuscript copies at both Oxford and Cambridge, which were edited in 1894 for the Henry Bradshaw Society by the Rev. W. H. Frere.

The Oxford manuscript (MS. Bodley 775) is submitted to a minute analysis by Mr. Nicholson. It consists in fact of three separate manuscripts bound together—a book of Tropes, a book of Sequences, and a book of Proses, all of them containing music written in neums. From internal evidence, which it would be tedious to recapitulate, Mr. Nicholson arrives at the conclusion that the Troper was written at Winchester between the years 971 and 980 A.D., i.e., about a century before the Cambridge copy, and that it is based upon a lost Tours troper. After comparing the tropes in the Bodleian manuscript with those found in other tropers, he writes: 'With these results it is impossible for me to doubt that the basilica of St. Martin outside Tours was a great centre of musical composition, whence tropes not only for Martin but for other Saints were obtained by Martinian foundations, and which from those foundations were borrowed by a few others in local contact or communication with them.' And again: 'I believe that the more the distribution of tropes and proses is investigated the more decisive will be the conclusion drawn that in the 9th and 10th centuries at least the Martinian basilica was a chief, if not the chief, Gallican centre for the composition of sacred music, and that to it not only French churches but many others beyond the confines of France owed a heavy acknowledgment.'

The importance of these statements need not be emphasised, and they derive some confirmation from the fact, which Mr. Nicholson does not mention, that Odo of Cluny, the reputed author of the famous 'Dialogus de Musica,' is known to have been 'archicantor' at St. Martin's between 900 and 909 A.D., and in that capacity to have composed hymns and antiphons in honour of St. Martin.

Another matter of musical interest on which light is thrown by these facsimiles is the vexed question of the origin of the four-lined stave of plainsong. Guido of Arezzo, who died about 1050 A.D., is said by some to have been the inventor of a red line for F and a yellow line for middle C, while others assert that he found the red and yellow lines already in use and perfected the stave by adding a black line between them and another black line above them. Now it so happens that one of the Bodleian manuscripts comes from Arezzo itself, where it was written about half-a-century after Guido's death. The neums in it are sometimes written without any lines at all, sometimes on 'blind' lines with the signatures F and c. On some pages a yellow line is used, without any signature, and on others a red line, signed F; but the red line when it occurs is always painted over the notes, so that it is clearly a later addition. No black lines are employed. Other Italian manuscripts of the 11th and 12th centuries, not from Arezzo, have red and yellow lines signed F and c, which may be contemporaneous with the text, though in every case the colour has been added after the notes were written; 'but in none of these MSS.,' says Mr. Nicholson, 'have I seen a black line for a or e, and nothing but the strongest palæographical evidence would allow me to believe that such a line was ever written by or in the time of Guido of Arezzo. That the red and yellow lines existed before him I shall also disbelieve till similar evidence is forthcoming. That Guido himself invented those two lines—though even on that point I have uttered a note of doubt—seems to me more probable than not. It is quite possible that when he wrote his letter to Brother Michael he had only spaced the neums in his Antiphoner, and that the further improvement of coloured lines and signatures was added by him afterwards.'

Mention is made above of certain 'secular or semi-secular' pieces, the discovery of which led to the separate publication of this volume. They occur in the Sequentiary and Proser which follow the Winchester Troper in MS. Bodley 775. The Rev. W. H. Frere, in his book on the Winchester Troper, had observed that some sequence melodies are called by fanciful names, and might perhaps be secular, such as 'Berta Vetula,' 'Frigdola,' 'Plantus Cygni,' &c. In most cases only the names of the tunes remain as an indication of their secular origin, but in the case of 'Plantus Cygni' ('The plaint of the swan') Mr. Nicholson has been able to give us an English translation of the text, which proves to be a prose poem of remarkable beauty, opening thus:

'Let the children complain with one bewailing
Of the winged swan who crossed the water-plains;
O, how bitterly she kept lamenting that she had left
The flowery dry lands and had sought the deep seas.'

It is clearly composed in a secular spirit, and merely adapted to sacred purposes by the addition of two lines at the end. With regard to 'Berta Vetula,' or 'Little Old Bertha,' of which only the title survives, the suggestion may perhaps be hazarded that it referred to the notorious Bertha, wife successively of Theobald II., Count of Provence, and Adalbert II., Duke of Tuscany, of whom Gibbon writes: 'France and Italy were scandalised by her gallantries; and till the age of three-score her lovers of every degree were the zealous servants of her ambition.' She died in 925 A.D.

Mr. Nicholson concludes his Introduction with a warm tribute to the memory of Sir John Stainer, and to the 'enthusiasm and generosity with which he undertook for the Bodleian Library a work the like of which has not to my knowledge been undertaken for any of the other greatest libraries of the world.' These three fine volumes of 'Early Bodleian Music' do indeed afford a splendid example of what might be done in other great libraries. Whether it is creditable to the University of Oxford that the execution of such a work should have been left to the enterprise and munificence of private individuals, publishers as well as editors, is another matter. As the years go by manuscripts tend more and more to accumulate in public libraries. Theirs is the 'dead hand,' which never relaxes its grasp. No Statute of Mortmain checks their acquisitiveness. The vision of a 'Sale by order of the Executors' which haunts the private collector, has no terrors for them. And as their collections grow, the more appalling does the risk of disaster by fire become. A manuscript once destroyed cannot be replaced 'for love or money.' The only means by which it can be in a sense insured is by reproduction in facsimile: and insurance of this kind ought to be regarded as a duty attaching to the possession of any manuscript of exceptional value. Our universities spend considerable sums every year on editing ancient texts and rendering obsolete the work of previous editors. If they would devote some portion of the money to publishing the manuscripts themselves in facsimile, they would be doing work of permanent value, and would certainly earn the gratitude of all students.

The recent Revolution in Organ Building. By George C. Miller.

[New York: The Charles Francis Press.

London: Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This is a book which may be read with interest and profit, even by those who do not find themselves seeing throughout eye to eye with the author. For example, there are many organists of standing who are by no means convinced of the advantage of enclosing the various manuals in swell-boxes. The result of such a proceeding is to induce, not variety, but monotony, though it may be conceded that for certain special effects the plan has something to be said for it. Again, we must refuse to believe that the specially efficacious swell-box of Hope-Jones 'does away with the need for soft stops in an organ.' A loud stop made soft by being enclosed in a box diminishing its power 'by many hundreds per cent.' has not the distinctive character of a genuine soft stop. Nor can the necessity for manipulating swell-shutters for each manual end in anything else but a race of one-legged pedallers, of which there are already enough.

Speaking of the crescendo pedal, Mr. Miller says: 'It is little used in England. It is the fashion there to regard it merely as a device to help an incompetent organist. It is contended that a crescendo pedal is most inartistic, as it is certain to be throwing on or taking off stops in the middle, instead of at the beginning or end of a musical phrase. In spite of this acknowledged defect, many of the best players in America regard it as a legitimate and helpful device.' English prejudice against the crescendo pedal is based solely upon the defect which Mr. Miller acknowledges, so our withers are unwrung.

While Mr. Miller's book is perhaps too much in the nature of a sustained pæan on Mr. Hope-Jones, it contains a mass of closely-packed, useful information. There are numerous illustrations of various mechanical devices and consoles, and portraits of Barker, Cavaillé-Coll, Willis, and Hope-Jones,—the four men to whom, according to the author, we owe the 'recent revolution.' The book is brightly written, and is not without occasional traces of its Transatlantic origin.

Te Deum. Set to music in F. By John E. West.

Benedictus. Set to music in F. By John E. West.
Parish Choir Book, Nos. 912, 913.

[Novello and Co., Ltd.]

Mr. West's setting of the morning canticles is modern church music of the best type, vigorous and free in style, but with melody, harmony, and even rhythm plainly influenced by ancient ecclesiastical models. Such phrases as that with which the 'Te Deum' opens, the broad theme at the words 'The holy Church throughout all the world,' and kindred motives in the 'Benedictus' (especially that set to the words 'As he spake, &c.'), unmistakably show the influence of plain-song. They are so well harmonized, however, and the organ part is so interesting, that they give no impression of triteness. The imitative writing is skilful without being dry, an excellent example in the 'Te Deum' being the 'page and a-half' of canon between treble and tenor with the alto and bass toying with the same device. A link between the 'Te Deum' and the 'Benedictus' is provided by the music set to 'praise Thee' in the former doing duty for 'Blessed' in the latter, the word being repeated softly, in parenthesis, so to speak, by the unaccompanied choir, after each of the first few phrases of the 'Benedictus,' which are sung in unison,—an effective device. The vocal-writing throughout is grateful, some specially pleasing passages being given to the trebles. The composer has avoided irritating repetitions of words, with the result that the Canticles are of very moderate length.

Four lectures on English song. By W. Fothergill Robinson.
[Sydney Acott & Co., Oxford.]

This booklet provides an excellent summary of the progress of song-making in the British Isles, from the Celtic harpers to Dr. Vaughan Williams, and of the outside and inside influences to which it has been subject. Mr. Robinson has evidently been a close investigator of his topic, which he analyses systematically.

Lochinvar. Air with variations. For S.A.T.B. (unaccompanied). Words by Scott. Music by Charles Wood.

[The Year-Book Press.]

Dr. Wood's choral ballad may be commended to well-equipped choirs in search of a picturesque work on a more extended scale than a part-song. The Variations illustrate the poem admirably, especially in the section for tenor solo, accompanied by divided altos and soprano solo, and in the dance section (Alla gagliarda) in which the quaint flourish at the end of each strain is very characteristic. The Finale, describing the elopement, is spirited and exciting.

Toccatina. By W. G. Alcock. Original Compositions for the Organ (New series), No. 28.

NOTES ON FACTS AND THEORIES RELATING TO JEWISH MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—If your correspondent, Dr. W. H. Grattan Flood, will re-read my article in the January number, p. 21, he will find in my referring to the 'Te Deum' I wrote, 'the so-called Ambrosian "Te Deum."' Further, as I had established one of my points by referring to Reuchlin's 'De Accentibus' (1518), it would have been superfluous to adduce the testimony of later writers!—Yours faithfully,

ARTHUR M. FRIEDLÄNDER.

88, Sutherland Avenue, W.
February 11, 1914.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Tradition cannot lightly be given up. The two main traditions are (1) that the 'Te Deum' was composed by St. Ambrose and St. Augustin (of Hippo), at the baptism of the latter; and (2) that it was composed by St. Hilary. Both traditions have so much to support them, that were it not for the fact that there are two, so much stress would not be laid on 'internal evidence.' Certainly if we take the 'Te Deum' as it stands as a complete whole, it could never have been composed by St. Ambrose or by St. Hilary. In its complete form it may have issued from Lerins, or it may have been compiled by St. Niceta of Remesiana.

But the composite character of the 'Te Deum' must not be overlooked. All critics are agreed that the first part is considerably older than the second. Unfortunately, there are few liturgiologists who are musicians, and fewer musicians who are liturgiologists. We must therefore study both the criticisms of liturgiologists and of musicians side by side.

The general tendency of the former was to give to the opening verses of the 'Te Deum' a Greek origin, and that of an early date—about the time of St. Ambrose and St. Hilary. Musical experts tell us that the music of the first part of the Ambrosian 'Te Deum' is distinctly older than the second; that in fact there is nothing in the first part which could not have been written at the time of St. Ambrose. Now we have further evidence of the antiquity of the music; for Mr. J. Curtis, the Greek music expert (in a note which he is kindly allowing me to publish in my book, 'The Sanctity of Church music') shows that the music is in exact accord with the Greek music of the period in which St. Ambrose lived, and even earlier. Again, returning to the criticism of the text, Milan was the meeting-place of East and West, of Greek and Latin; and most critics seem to have overlooked the fact that St. Hilary was at Milan in the year A.D. 364. Is it not possible that this may give the solution to the difficulty, and that both traditions may be to a great extent correct? It may be that a Greek hymn, corresponding to the opening verses of the 'Te Deum,' was known at this time at Milan; that a copy of this was carried away by St. Hilary and translated into Latin—this would be sufficient to account for the word 'composuit'; again, this hymn a few years later was used by St. Ambrose at St. Augustin's baptism, St. Ambrose himself setting it to music. That alone is sufficient to account for the fact that it is given the title of 'Canticum SS. Ambrosii et Augustini.'

Both liturgiologists and musicians agree that the change as well in diction as in musical style occurs at about the same point in the 'Te Deum.' Neither tradition seems as yet to be absolutely disproved; the tendency to-day seems rather for the pendulum to swing back to the traditional authorship, which no one now would consider to refer to the hymn as a complete work.—Yours faithfully,

T. FRANCIS FORTH.

'DICTION' OR 'ELOCUTION.'

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—May I inquire through your columns why the word 'diction' has become so much used among musicians when elocution or articulation is meant?

Even in our principal musical examinations marks are allotted to singers for 'diction.'

According to the best authorities, diction means the choice of words in speaking or writing, or the 'style' in composition. With choice of words a singer has nothing to do, having only to sing the words set; but with elocution or good delivery of words—which includes good articulation, right emphasis, and expression—he has.

Why, then, not use the right definition? A teacher should not have to explain to a pupil that an Examining Board is incorrect in its definition.—Faithfully yours,

WALLIS A. WALLIS.

MUSIC IN PREPARATORY SCHOOLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—I trust that you will allow me the courtesy of your columns, in which to state briefly the musical curriculum at Farnborough School, Hants, as showing to what extent Preparatory Schools are endeavouring to foster musical culture.

The school consists of about fifty boys, more than half of whom learn music. No boy has less than two lessons per week, and every boy is provided with definite times for practice, which in the case of all the younger boys is supervised. There are seven pianofortes available for practice, and all lessons and a large proportion of practices take place in school hours.

There is a school choir consisting of sixteen boys and the members of the staff, and a full choral service is sung twice each Sunday. The Canticles are sung to settings by such composers as Stanford, Garrett, Stainer, and the like, and an Anthem is performed each week.

There are five choir practices each week, when, besides the learning of the service music, voice-training and sight-reading from notation are systematically taught.

Every Saturday evening the whole school joins in singing school-songs, folk-songs, and national airs.

There is a concert of some sort each term, and at the most important one in the winter term a big choral work, such as Stanford's 'The Revenge,' is performed.

I may add that a special prize is offered each term for music.

I do not contend that results are entirely satisfactory, or that there is no room for improvement; but I do feel that those who are continually decrying the cultivation of music in Preparatory Schools generally show deplorable ignorance of the high-minded and earnest work that these institutions are carrying on.

THE MUSIC OF THE FUTURISTS. TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I have been studying Schönberg's 'Drei Stücke für Klavier,' Op. 11, and these fill me with dismay. I cannot imagine anyone who is satisfied with the music of Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner; of Strauss, Debussy and Sibelius, calling such stuff as these pieces 'music'! Though I am bound to say, there is (to the eye) a certain shape and symmetry about them, but when they are played, the dissonances are so great and so unthinkable that it is almost impossible to grasp what the composer is aiming at. He is much devoted to the jump of a minor ninth, both in his melodic progressions and in his filling up of the left-hand parts. Now a minor ninth is a very discordant interval, and when you get many of varied tonality in one bar, the discordance is frightful. There is no real ending in any one of them; that of No. 3 being perhaps the most chaotic and inane. Now, what I want to ask—and I feel sure that there are thousands of music-lovers who would agree with me—is this: Are we to throw overboard suddenly all our established canons and rules of musical art, and accept that which our ears and instincts tell us is hideous, because a few ultra-modern composers choose to say 'This is music, this is a new musical form to which at present your ears are unaccustomed, but which will soon grow upon you, just as the (to a conventional mind) strange new chords and tonal progressions evolved during the last century of music have done.'

I do not believe it. If we accept the well-known masterpieces as divine inspirations, how can we help regarding such stuff as this about which I am writing as little short of an impertinence?

If music is to become nothing but a string of clashing discords, jumping about from one key to another without respect for any tonal system and utterly unconnected with each other, what will happen to our parent forms of composition such as part-writing or chamber music, in which so many great musicians have excelled? These will surely have to be relegated to Limbo.*

Some people affirm that Wagner is getting out of date. Surely no really beautiful works of art can ever become so. There is something divine, something of another world which keeps all beautiful creations ever fresh. Fashions and fashions come and go, and I feel convinced that before very long all this uncouth and shapeless music will disappear, along with Cubism and Post-impressionism and everything else which is a mockery of the beautiful in art and in nature.

Obituary.

We regret to announce the following deaths:

MR. FRANK G. WALSH, for many years organist of the historic church of St. Mary's, Shandon, Cork (associated with Father Prout's song 'The bells of Shandon'), died at Kingston College, Mitchelstown, co. Cork, on January 28, aged sixty-five. Mr. Walsh had been blind from his early youth, and yet he was an accomplished organist and choir-trainer. In private life he was a most genial companion, and was held in the highest esteem. Unaided he walked through the most crowded thoroughfares in Cork, and moved about as if in possession of his sight. In 1909 he resigned his post at Shandon (being succeeded by Dr. Annie Patterson), and retired to Kingston College, which is somewhat on the lines of the Charterhouse. His funeral was large and impressive, and a number of his Cork friends attended at the grave.

HENRY STEPHEN GATES, who died at Brighton on February 6. He was one of the last surviving musicians who could remember Mendelssohn, and had actually played under him. Mr. Gates was born at Brighton in 1829, the son of an organ-builder. In early life he went to London, and was living with Mr. Hopkins, of the Temple Church, in 1847. There he saw Mendelssohn, and played in the orchestra when 'Elijah' was given by the Sacred Harmonic Society at Exeter Hall, Mendelssohn conducting. In 1851 he returned to Brighton, and was organist (to the same clergyman, but at various churches) till 1894; he was also active as musical director and bandmaster. He retired in 1901.

J. HARPER KEARTON, who died on February 6, at his residence at Southwick, Brighton, aged sixty-six, after a long illness. Born at Knaresborough, he started singing at the age of seven as a choir-boy. At fifteen he was appointed organist at a local church, and three years afterwards became tenor singer at York Minster. Two years later he was appointed to a vicar-choralskip at Wells Cathedral, Somerset, and during his nine years' stay there he was made music-master at Wells Grammar School and at St. Ann's School, Baltonsborough, professor of singing at Downside College, near Bath, and organist at Croscombe. After a period at the Royal College of Music, under the tutorship of Sir A. Sullivan and Signor Randegger, he was appointed (in 1877) vicar-choral at Westminster Abbey, and thenceforward rapidly made his way. He sang frequently for Sir August Manns at the Crystal Palace, for the Sacred Harmonic Society at the Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts, at the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts, at the Promenade Concerts given at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1886, and at Festivals in company with Sir Charles Santley and Madame Albani amongst others. At the Jubilee Service held in Westminster Abbey he had the honour of being chosen to sing the tenor solo in the late Prince Consort's Te Deum. After a severe attack of rheumatic fever, whilst continuing his appointment as principal tenor at Westminster Abbey and limiting the amount of his concert work, he became principally identified with the Westminster Singers' Quartet, of which he was the originator and musical director. He was a composer of numerous musicianly and refined vocal and instrumental works, including organ music, church anthems, madrigals, glees, part-songs, and vocal duets. His wife and six children survive him.

ANN STAINER (sister of the late Sir John Stainer), on January 30, aged eighty-eight. For fifty years, from 1849, she held the post of organist of the Magdalen Hospital Chapel, Streatham, and during the whole of that half-century she never missed a single service. This probably is a unique record. She sang soprano in the choir on the occasion of the first performance in this country of the Bach 'St. Matthew' Passion music, which was given under Sir W. Sterndale Bennett. She was for some years a member of Henry Leslie's Choir.

CLARA ANNE CUMMINGS, on February 4, at Sydcote, Dulwich, the wife for fifty-nine years of Dr. W. H. Cummings, in her eightieth year. She was the daughter of John William Hobbs (1799-1877), a noted tenor singer. Mrs. Cummings had for some years past been an invalid. Deep sympathy is felt for Dr. Cummings.

THOMAS BRANDON, aged eighty-four, in his day a well-known vocalist. As a lay-clerk at Gloucester Cathedral he was a fellow-worker with Dr. S. S. Wesley. His last professional appearance occurred in 1895.

WILLIAM SIMMONS, a cottager of Flyford-Flavell, Worcestershire, the constructor of the one-manual organ described in our issue for February, 1911, as 'The organ that took twenty years to build.'

ARTHUR SIMMS, Mus. Bac., at Hythe, Kent, on February 4. He was born at Birmingham in 1839.

DIEPPE COMPETITIONS, JULY.

With reference to the announcement regarding this event, we are asked to state that it has been decided that sight-singing shall not be obligatory for English Societies. The 'studied' (prepared) music competition remains obligatory. English Societies that have been classified in the Division d'Excellence or the Superior Division will be admitted to the 'Concours d'Honneur,' even in the case of their not having obtained a prize in the sight-reading or studied music competitions. In these two competitions English Societies compete only between themselves, while they have to compete with French or other foreign Societies in the 'Concours d'Honneur.'

The prizes indicated for the 'Concours d'Honneur' apply only to male-voice choirs.

Mixed-voice choirs are admitted to the 'Concours d'Honneur' with other mixed-voice choirs (French and foreign), but the prize is £8 (200 francs), and there is only one prize.

The above particulars are not in the prospectus as originally issued. They will appear in future editions. The correspondent for English applicants is M. L. Brau, Comité des Fêtes, Syndicat d'Initiative, Dieppe.

EAST ANGLIA.

A movement to establish a competition Festival in this district was inaugurated at a meeting held at Ipswich on February 16. The area it is proposed to serve includes Cambridge, Ely, Huntingdon, Norfolk, and West and East Suffolk. Mr. Hepburn Hume was one of the chief speakers. He said that prominent musical gentlemen had observed that the elementary schools that came up to a local competition a second and third time had shown marked improvement. He thought that this educational benefit should be extended to choral Societies. A general discussion showed that there was considerable interest in the proposal. Another meeting is soon to be held, at which details will be discussed.

MR. WILLIAM WOOLLEY'S NOTTINGHAM CHOIR.

This is one of the most highly trained choirs in the Nottingham district. It is often heard at competitive gatherings, but it very rightly does not confine its activities to this field; rather it regards competitions as a school where lessons can be learned and applied to the public work of the Choir. It is doubtful whether the standard of technique and interpretation displayed by the Choir at its concerts would ever have been attained without the stimulus and the chastening effect of competition. Further, the Choir has educated its local audiences to appreciate the finest unaccompanied part-music and the value of high finish of execution. The concert given by the Choir at the Circus Street Hall, Nottingham, on January 29, exemplified all these points. The choral portion of the programme included the too-seldom-heard three choral songs composed by Dr. Walford Davies, known under the general title of 'England's pleasant land'; two of Josef Holbrooke's most successful part-songs, 'Through groves sequestered' and 'Footsteps of Angels' (a beautiful and touching piece, difficult in places); Bantock's fine setting of Shelley's 'Music when soft voices die'; Wilbye's sprightly madrigal, 'Ye that do live in pleasures plenty'; German's popular 'O peaceful night' (as arranged by the composer for mixed voices); Lassen's 'The Spanish gipsy girl,' for female voices; Elgar's thrilling part-song, 'My love dwelt in a northern land' (one of the composer's earliest and best works in this form); and Dr. Hathaway's 'Spring,' besides other pieces. The concert was the greatest success the Choir has ever had. Three of their pieces were encored. The audience was overwhelming. Miss Hilda Parnham, Miss Lizzie Sheraton, Mr. Ernest Fisher, and Mr. Samuel Peacock sang solos, and the Nottingham Harmonic Quartet sang one piece. Miss Lizzie Parsons accompanied, and Mr. William Woolley conducted. The programme book contained some well-written and luminous notes on the choral pieces. But we ask, would they not have been of even more interest to the audience if the words had been printed? Enjoyment of choral music is much enhanced when words are before the eye as well as the ear.

THE NAVAL AND MILITARY MUSICAL UNION.

To the Editor of THE COMPETITION FESTIVAL RECORD.

SIR,—With reference to your courteous notice in the COMPETITION FESTIVAL RECORD of to-day's date of the process of reorganization of 'The Naval and Military Musical Union,' I would venture, if you will kindly permit me, to modify the opening statement therein made.

The 'organization of choral competitions throughout the Services' is but an incidental feature of the Union's work, a means to an end only. The objects which the Union has in view may be summed up as follows:

- (1) The introduction into the Services of a higher class of music than has hitherto obtained in canteen, fo'c'sle, smoking concerts, and elsewhere; and especially the encouragement of the singing of the fine old land and sea songs in part- and unison-singing.
- (2) The encouragement of friendly co-operation in music between the various branches of the Services.
- (3) The encouragement of the singing of good songs upon the line of march.

In brief, the aims of the Union may find expression in the terms, 'heartiness, good-fellowship, and esprit de corps.'

It is a little premature to state that the several distinguished senior officers whom you mentioned have become additional vice-presidents. We are gratified in such acceptance by the Chief of the Imperial General Staff and by H.S.H. Prince Louis of Battenberg; the actual acceptances of the two other officers have not yet been received.

There are one or two other trivial points to which I might refer, but I will not occupy your space further. The next Annual Report will be issued at the beginning of May, and this will contain the fullest details of the reorganization and progress of the movement for general information. I may add, however, that the interest evinced upon the part of all the General Officers Commanding-in-chief throughout the Empire, the several Admirals of the Fleet and Admirals in actual command has proved most gratifying, and the practical support upon their part to the movement is proving of the greatest possible value.—I am, Sir, Your obedient servant, 37, Russell Square, W.C. A. CORBETT-SMITH, Hon. Sec. and Member of General Council.

February 1, 1914.

BOOTLE.

The fourth Annual Eisteddfod (open only to competitors under twenty-one years of age) was held on January 31, and attracted a large number of entries. In the chief class the prize was awarded to the Liverpool Co-operative Junior Choir (Mr. D. Roberts), and in another class the Stanley Road Children's Choir (Mr. John Hughes) was successful. Dr. Caradog Roberts adjudicated.

FARNWORTH, NEAR BOLTON.—February 4 and 7.

A Competitive Festival, the outcome of the singing competitions held in bygone years at the open-air Galas of the Farnworth and District Temperance Union, took place in the Moor Hall. Fourteen classes, all vocal, were arranged, and though the entries in each were more select than numerous, yet in several there were keen contests, as the adjudicator's marks appended will show:

JUNIOR CHOIRS.

Contralto ... 'Secrecy' (Hugo Wolf) ... Miss D. Bradley
Tenor ... 'Adelaide' (Beethoven) Mr. J. Holland
Bass 'The two Grenadiers' (Schumann) Mr. D. German

We draw special attention to the very high character of the songs set as tests. It is in this department that the popular taste of the day is apt to be too much considered with a view to capture entries. Mr. Walter S. Nesbitt was adjudicator.

HUDDERSFIELD ('THE MRS. SUNDERLAND COMPETITIONS').—February 13, 14.

The importance of the share taken by solo singers and players in these competitions necessitates a preliminary day's work of 'weeding-out.' The survivors of this process sang in the final test on the second day, the prize-winners being as follows:

Junior violin solo (ten entries).—Reginald Whitehouse.
Senior violin solo (ten entries).—Reginald Whitehouse.
Choirboy's solo (fourteen entries).—T. E. Scott.
Soprano solo (forty-three entries).—Miss Doris Hall.
Bass solo (eleven entries).—Mr. E. Peake.

The choral contests resulted as follows:

ELEMENTARY SCHOOL CHOIRS.

2nd.	Elland Church (Mr. W. H. Ainley).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

1st.	Holme Valley (Mr. I. Silverwood).
2nd.	York (Mr. H. S. Wilkinson).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

Test: 'The singers' (Mackenzie).

1st.	Bradford Philharmonic (Mr. C. Milne Rooks).
2nd.	Colne Valley (Mr. T. E. Pearson).

The adjudicators were Mr. J. Nichols for the violin-playing and Dr. A. H. Brewer for the other classes.

CARLISLE.—February 16, 17, 18.

Unmistakable signs of progress were shown in the course of this Festival, both in the response of choral bodies in the neighbourhood and in the character of their performances. Satisfaction with the musical results was expressed by Mr. Harry Evans, the adjudicator.

On the first day an interesting competition was provided by choirs from business houses, for whom the tests were Walthew's 'There be none of beauty's daughters,' and Tozer's 'My bonnie Bell.' Out of five entrants, the first- and second-prize winners were Holme Head Works Choral Society (Mr. Andrew Sharp) and Carr's Choral Society. In a competition for male-voice choirs the test was C. H. Lloyd's 'A wet sheet and a flowing sea,' and the result as follows: 1st, C.Y.M.S. Quartet; 2nd, Hudson Scott's.

The bulk of the second day was occupied by children's competitions. Schools and children's choirs from smaller districts provided some of the best results of the day with their singing of Marcello's 'As the hart panteth,' and Anderson's 'Sound the flute.' The winners in these two contests were Keswick Blue Choir (Miss H. Marshall) and Uppery Goodwin G.F.S. (Miss A. Mann). Brook Street Children's Choir (Miss E. Irving) were winners in a sight-reading competition. This choir gained ninety-nine marks and a first-prize for their singing of Stanford's 'The echoing green.' Carleton Day School (Miss N. B. Archer) were the best among a class of village schools, and Brook Street won a prize for three-part singing. There were also classes for pianoforte-playing (first-prize, Annie Peat) and boys' solo-singing (first prize, James Lowes). Sydney H. Nicholson's cantata, 'Childe Allen-a-Dale,' was performed by the combined choirs under the direction of the composer.

In a group of contests for girls' choirs from business houses the first-prizes were taken by Charlotte Street Young Women's Mutual Society, Central Crown Street Girls' Club, and Atlas Works Choral Society.

Adult choral competitions were decided on the third day. In classes for two-part singing the first places were taken by Calthwaite (Mr. W. H. Reid) and Inglewood, the tests being Coleridge-Taylor's 'Beauty and truth' and Charles Wood's 'To music.' Calthwaite were first in unison sight-singing. A choir from Mosser took the first place in a class for rural choral societies. 'Hear the voice of prayer,' by J. L. Hopkins, was the test in anthem-singing; in this division Lorton Church Choir were successful. Mosser District Choir gave the best example of hymn-singing.

The challenge cup contest for choral societies attracted eight entries, among whom the best were Dovenby Singing Class (Mr. T. L. Hayston), first; Lorton, second; Clifton, third. The test was Hatton's 'Ever true.'

SCHOOL CHOIR COMPETITIONS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

We extract from the Cape Colony Education Gazette the following reports of school choir competitions. Many other similar events have been recorded during the year 1913. We draw attention to the excellent working of ear exercises. Many of the children at Karroo and Worcester wrote down correctly every one of the fifty-five notes played as a test.

KARROO PUBLIC SCHOOL CHOIR COMPETITION.

The choirs were heard separately on August 6, 8, and 14, 1913. The conductor in each case was new to the work, and in Murraysburg and Victoria West had only been in charge of the choirs since the beginning of the quarter.

Mr. Arthur Lee, Departmental Instructor, who acted as adjudicator, reports as follows: 'The Beaufort West Girls' School Choir gave an exceedingly fine rendering of the prescribed song, "Now for a stately minuet," by H. E. Nichol. The girls did uncommonly well in rhythm and emotional development. The best tone was heard in Murraysburg, but there the final consonants were not always clearly articulated; and in Mendelssohn's "O wert thou in the cauld blast," this choir finished a tone sharp, the grace-note in the phrase "with thee to reign" being sung as a bridge-note. Victoria West were too dependent on their copies in both of their songs. The altos were not happy with the discords in "Violets" (F. H. Cowen). Beaufort West's selection, "O hush thee, my babie" (Sullivan) was sung with fine effect. The sight-singing was good, Victoria West excelling in the unison test and Beaufort West in the dual.

The award was made in favour of Beaufort West Girls' Public School Choir, trained by Miss I. M. Truter.

EAR-TEST COMPETITION.

The test was an original melody of fifty-five notes played on the pianoforte. The results:

	Murraysburg.	Marks.
Wilhelmina van As	55
Anna Vorster	41
	Victoria West.
Alice van der Merwe	55
Deborah de Villiers	40
	Beaufort West.
Gladys Blyth	55
Johanna van Vuuren	55
Lizzie Zikman	53
Nellie Conradie	45

QUMBU NATIVE SCHOOL CHOIR COMPETITION.

The competition was held in the Court House, Qumbu, October 13, 1913, Mr. F. Farrington, Departmental Instructor, adjudicating. The competing choirs were:

- Lower Culunca (Julius Ngxola).
- Qanqu (Victor Lokwe).
- Shawbury (Simon Mtselu).
- Nyanisweni (Kildas Stofile).
- Tyira (James Nqakala).

The prescribed song was Mendelssohn's 'Sabbath Morn,' the selected pieces being:

- 'Good-morrow to my lady fair' (Grieve).
- 'In going to my lonesome bed' (Edwards).
- 'The fisherman's good-night' (Bishop).
- 'Good-morrow to my lady fair' (Grieve).
- 'On gallant company' (Southard).

The sight-tests were well attempted by each choir, Lower Culunca showing to great advantage. The altos of Nyanisweni were outclassed in the two-part test. Tyira took the unison test too slowly, and thus lost the rhythm; further, the choir was largely dependent upon leaders.

The songs were disappointing, owing to lack of expression and to faulty tone. Even the best choirs failed to do justice to Mendelssohn's song. Shawbury and Qanqu were moderately successful. These choirs were also successful in the selected songs, Shawbury being superior in tone, phrasing, and sustaining power. The chief faults noticed among the weaker choirs were want of expression, non-observance of marks relating to rate, hardness of tone, taking breath in the wrong place, want of clearness in articulation, and clipping of words.

There is no shield for competition as yet, but book-prizes are awarded to Shawbury for general efficiency, and also to Lower Culunca for excellence in singing from notes.

MISSION CHOIR COMPETITION FOR THE DISTRICTS OF CERES, ROBERTSON, TULBAGH, AND WORCESTER.

The competition was held on August 18, 1913, in the Rhenish Church, Worcester, the spacious building being crowded. Four schools competed.

Mr. Arthur Lee, who acted as adjudicator, reports as follows.

PRESCRIBED SONG.

(Three-part unaccompanied.)

'The Angel of the Rain,' by Roland Rogers.* A really excellent rendering was given in most respects by each choir. The conducting was admirable, and the response of the choristers very precise. Tulbagh fell behind the others in piano singing, but led in the rallentando passages and in the observance of rests. 'Zephyr' was sung with a long 'e' by Saron and Tulbagh, and the latter choir and Worcester turned the second syllable of 'yellow' nearly into an 'aw.'

SIGHT-SINGING.

Reading of unison test firm and fluent, each choir scoring over 90 per cent. of marks. Tulbagh Road and Saron achieved a similar success in the dual test.

The award was made in favour of the choir of Saron Rhenish School, trained by Mr. E. J. Magappa. It is worth noting that three of the conductors were trained as pupil-teachers in the Rhenish School, Worcester, by Mr. A. Fransman, the conductor of the local choir.

EAR-TEST COMPETITION.

The test was a song of fifty-five notes played on a harmonium. The writers of the best papers are given below. Those names marked with an asterisk introduced into the air one or two passing-notes of the bass.

CAPE DIVISION MISSION SCHOOL CHOIR COMPETITION.

Three choirs competed in this competition, which was held in the Town Hall, Wynberg, on the evening of Thursday, August 28. The schools competing were: Cape Town School of Industry (E.C.), Klipfontein Wesleyan Mission School, and Spaanschmat River D.R.C. Mission School. The choir of Battswood (D.R.C.) Mission School, the holders of the shield for 1912-13, also contributed excellent renderings of S. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Oh! the summer' and 'Viking song,' and Pinsuti's 'I sing because I love to sing.' The general arrangements for the competition were successfully carried out by Mr. F. Hendricks.

Mr. W. Stubbings and Mr. Arthur Lee, Departmental Instructor, who acted as adjudicators, report as follows.

PRESCRIBED SONG.

'The Angel of the Rain,' by Roland Rogers.* The most finished performance was given by the School of Industry, the Allegro giocoso movement being given with impressive effect. Klipfontein made a good second. Consonants were clear, but the vowels of 'with,' 'yellow,' and 'rain' were faulty, and the chromatic notes not always firmly intoned. The Spaanschmat River Choir was at its best in the final movement, especially in the phrase, 'the merry patt'ring raindrops fall.'

SIGHT-SINGING.

The Spaanschmat Choir did not know the notation of the fixed divisions of a pulse. The alto part of the second test was well sustained. The Klipfontein Choir was the best of the three, but all the pupils in the soprano section did not sing in the dual test. In the case of the sight-singing by the School of Industry Choir, a couple of rhythms gave trouble in the unison test, and the high passages in the second item were not found easy by the soprano section when singing to lah.

The award was made in favour of the Choir of Cape Town School of Industry, trained by Miss A. E. Rynhoud.

THE TIMES.

The plan of the book is exceedingly attractive. An essay on "The Boy Shakespeare," with illustrations, leads the way to the games which such songs as "Come unto these yellow sands," "Full fathom five," "It was a lover," and many others suggest. . . . The point which is most essential is that the choice of music is good of its kind, and the volume ought to be welcomed by all who are helping children to learn through their play.

THE MORNING POST.

Another book that is certain to be appreciated is found in "Songs from Shakespeare with Dances." . . . The literary matter referring to Shakespeare is made very interesting with its account of the customs, living, and furniture of the time when he was growing up to greatness. . . . The whole work is of the utmost value in making Shakespeare known in this country, where he is probably less understood than by any other nation.

THE QUEEN.

It is a handsome volume profusely illustrated, with many helpful directions as to the execution of the dances, besides information regarding the source of each song, date of the composer, &c. . . . We not only sympathise with the idea and its practical use, but heartily recommend the publication, the perusal of which affords endless delight.

THE WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

The authoress explains that her aim has been to place in the hands of capable teachers a really good collection of Shakespeare songs, with dances descriptive of the songs, set to music based upon the Shakespeare melodies, and this object seems to have been very happily attained.

THE BOOKSELLER.

The book aims at placing in the hands of capable teachers a really good selection of Shakespeare's songs, with descriptive dances set to music based upon Shakespeare melodies. This aim has been completely attained, and the book may be very confidently recommended to all who wish to find a new entertainment for schools and school children.

THE STAR.

Is a beautifully bound and printed volume.

THE BIRMINGHAM DAILY MAIL.

The whole volume is a treasure trove for children.

THE YORKSHIRE POST.

In these days of open-air pageants and pastoral plays, a volume of "Songs from the Plays of William Shakespeare, with Dances" will be found of great service. It is of more than historic value.

THE BRISTOL TIMES AND MIRROR.

A very delightful, helpful, useful, and instructive book in teaching and training of children and giving them joy in the life and songs of Shakespeare. . . . The publication is indeed a charming one.

THE LOOKER-ON.

This book is not only beautifully produced, but places in the hands of capable teachers a splendid selection of Shakespeare's songs, with dances descriptive of the songs, and set to music based on Shakespeare melodies. Such an arrangement of simultaneous Shakespeare dance and song has never been placed before the teaching public before, and we very heartily commend it.

Musical score for "The Rose of the Valley." The score is written for voice and piano. It features a key signature of one sharp (F#) and a 2/4 time signature. The music is divided into three systems. The first system includes the vocal melody and piano accompaniment, with lyrics "sweet... and soon, well - - a -". The second system continues the vocal melody and piano accompaniment, with lyrics "day! The Rose of the... val-ley, it... wi-thered a -". The third system concludes the vocal melody and piano accompaniment, with lyrics "way... the Rose of the... val-ley, it... wi-thered a-way." The score includes dynamic markings such as f (forte), mf (mezzo-forte), and pp (pianissimo). The piano part features a prominent bass line and a treble line with chords and arpeggios.

The key signature is D major (two sharps: F# and C#), and the time signature is 4/4. The vocal line is written on a treble clef staff, and the piano accompaniment is written on a grand staff (treble and bass clefs). The lyrics are: "in - no - cence . ren - dered a . . Heaven . . on . 'THE VANITY OF VANITIES.'

PROF. BANTOCK'S NEW CHORAL WORK.

BY OUR LIVERPOOL CORRESPONDENT.

Prof. Granville Bantock's new Choral Symphony for unaccompanied voices, 'The Vanity of Vanities,' was performed for the first time, on February 14, by the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union, to whom with their conductor, Mr. Harry Evans, the work is inscribed. This time Prof. Bantock has found a congenial subject in the Book of Ecclesiastes, arranged in seven detached movements occupying five or six minutes each in performance. In his previous Choral Symphony, 'Atalanta in Calydon,' Prof. Bantock scored for four separate choirs in twenty parts, a combination which was found supremely difficult in performance. Profiting by experience he has greatly improved his plan in 'The Vanity of Vanities,' which is written for one choir divided into twelve parts: two each for sopranos, mezzo-sopranos, contraltos, tenors, baritones, and basses. This method approaches the composer's ideal much more readily and naturally, and it was evident that twelve singable vocal parts provide amply sufficient variety of tone-colour. It is certain that Prof. Bantock has been impressed by the choral competitions at which he has officiated as adjudicator, to a far greater extent than any English composer of late years. And he has made practical use of his discovery of the almost limitless colourings possible with varied tone strata of human voices. Of course these latter must belong to practised and highly-trained singers, but given such material as the three hundred singers of the Welsh Choral Union, Prof. Bantock has proved that unaccompanied voices have possibilities in combination hitherto unexploited. In carrying on the traditions of the old English choral writers Prof. Bantock has discarded their simple set forms of contrapuntal expression almost entirely, and has invented a new style. This, for lack of a better term, may be described as choral improvisation with a far greater breadth of harmonic treatment than obtained in the days of Byrd, Gibbons, or of Purcell, whose chorus 'Soul of the world,' from his 'St. Cecilia's Day,' was a happily-chosen prelude sung immediately before 'The Vanity of Vanities.' Here we had 'the laws of free proportion joined, made up of various parts one perfect harmony.' The fugal form, however, is one which Prof. Bantock does not press into his service. He finds dramatic and emotional expression in choral recitative, antiphony, and chordal expansion. It is music of a type which greatly interests finely-trained singers, and the necessarily severe rehearsals which this especial body of chorists underwent proved a source of pleasure to them in evolving rich and novel harmonies which varied from the indefinable sighing of an æolian harp to the full-toned splendour of a mighty organ. Of the seven divisions, the opening and antiphonal fourth movements are especially fine. The initial theme, 'Vanity of Vanities,' is one of nobility and arresting significance, and is heard again in the final bars of the work as a faint echo of the insoluble enigma of the words.

The second movement, 'I said in my heart,' is one which is immediately noticeable, for it is cast in the rhythm of an Oriental dance, the bouche fermée effect being used in a novel and original fashion. In this movement the composer uses a continuous melodic figure which gives way to an allargando of stern and strenuous chords for the final words, 'And there was no profit under the sun.' It is remarkable that there is so little monotony in the prevailing reflective treatment of the text, and it is apparent that in such incessantly modulatory music, key-signatures are of little significance in movements which begin in one key and end in another. Whatever the manner, one is led to the conclusion that the composer has managed to express clear intuitions of the problems of life and death in his profoundly moving musical setting of King Solomon's enigmatical philosophy. He has not set out with the intention of writing merely beautiful music, but has occasionally achieved it in a remarkable way.

The work had a most attentive hearing, and after each movement a torrent of applause broke out—it seemed spontaneously. This was no doubt largely due to the magnificence of the choral performance, in which the choir and conductor surpassed all their previous records. It is a case in which the composer and choir have been mutually stimulating. The heartiness of the greeting which awaited Prof. Bantock when called to the platform was such as he will surely not readily forget.

OPERA IN LONDON FROM 1700 TO 1740.

On January 20 Dr. W. H. Cummings read a paper at the meeting of the Musical Association on 'The Lord Chamberlain and Opera in London from 1700 to 1740.' In his possession was a folio volume comprising more than eighty papers referring to matters connected with the theatres at Drury Lane, Covent Garden, and the Haymarket; and from these he had extracted a number of interesting details concerning the giving of Italian opera during the period specified. These documents, which were originally in the possession of Thomas Coke, the Vice-Chamberlain, included letters, agreements, lists of salaries, receipts of various performances, and autographs of notable persons. The Crown had for many years assumed the right of regulating all theatrical representations in London and Westminster, and eventually only certain theatres, licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, were permitted to perform plays and kindred entertainments.

Queen Anne possessed considerable musical talent and love for the art, though she had no love for theatrical performances, and one of her first acts on ascending the throne was to issue 'Royal commands for the better regulation of theatres,' which provided that no plays or operas should be produced without licence. All who infringed these 'Commands' were liable to 'such punishment as the Law inflicts upon Vagrants and Vagabonds.' Early in the reign, a new Opera House was erected in the Haymarket by Captain Vanbrugh, where His Majesty's Theatre now stands, and while it was being built, musical performances were given at Drury Lane Theatre. At this time Thomas Clayton, formerly a member of the Royal Band, had returned from Italy, bringing with him a stock of Italian songs, which he altered, translated, and adapted to form an opera, with the title 'Arsinoë, Queen of Cyprus.' This, with great self-confidence, he put forward in order 'to introduce the Italian manner of singing to the English stage, which has not been before attempted.' The music and the libretto were alike contemptible, but the public applauded the performance of the opera for twenty-four nights in the first season and eleven nights in the second season.

The Queen's Theatre, Haymarket, was opened on April 9, 1705, with a new opera called 'The triumph of love,' but it proved quite unsuccessful. A year later 'Camilla,' composed by M. A. Bononcini, brother of Handel's rival, was produced at Drury Lane with great success, receiving sixty-four performances in four years. This was sung in Italian and English according to the nationality of the singers, a circumstance which afforded the wits and critics an opportunity to indulge in ridicule, though the audiences accepted the situation with indifference. A like absurdity prevailed in Germany, where it was customary to sing the recitatives in German and the airs in Italian. The heroine of the piece 'Camilla,' was represented by Mrs. Tofts, whose English was responded to in Italian by Valentini, who personated Turnus.

Mrs. Tofts had an exquisite, silver-toned voice; she acted with such intensity of feeling that at last her mind gave way, and she became obsessed with the idea that her mimic state was real. On one occasion, at the Duke of Somerset's, some thirty gentlemen, after she had sung, desired to kiss her. She permitted them to do so on payment of a guinea a kiss. Some had three, some four, and others, more extravagant, paid for five at that price.

Vanbrugh was for some time stage-manager at the Queen's Theatre, but his ventures not having been profitable he assigned the whole concern to Owen Swiney, who produced in 1708 'Pyrrhus and Demetrius,' by Alessandro Scarlatti. His company included a notable singer, Nicolini Grimaldi, afterwards known as Nicolini, who received £322 10s.

In 1710 Handel came to England, and was engaged to write an opera for the Haymarket. 'Rinaldo' was completed in fourteen days, and secured an instant success. The magnificent stage display, coupled with the great beauty of the music, astonished the audience, and the opera was received with unprecedented enthusiasm. The papers include one in Heidegger's hand: 'May the 5th, 1711. Mr. Collier agrees to pay Mr. Lunican for the copy of "Rinaldo" this day the sum of eight pounds, and three pounds every day "Rinaldo" is play'd till six and twenty pounds are pay'd, and he gives him leave to take the said Opera in his custody after every day of acting it, till the whole six and twenty pounds are paid.' This payment was for copying the vocal and orchestral parts.

Another memorandum shows various payments, but in every instance there was a significant item of a large sum that 'remains due.' Opera management does not seem to have been financially successful, and about 1712 Swiney absconded. Handel then produced some operas at the Haymarket, notably 'Amadigi,' which was so popular that the management were compelled to issue an edict against encores.

The opera performances at the Haymarket came to an end in 1717, but after a lapse of two or three years, a number of noblemen associated themselves in a new venture, and with a guarantee fund of £50,000 established the Royal Academy of Music. Bononcini was invited to come from Rome, Ariosti from Berlin, and Handel was commissioned to travel to Dresden to engage eminent vocalists. Amongst the operas produced in the first season was Handel's 'Radamisto,' which was received with great enthusiasm. The directors thought it would be a clever thing to have an opera composed by the three men already mentioned, each to write one Act. Bononcini and Handel accepted the commission, but as Ariosti did not arrive in London in time, the first Act was written by Filippo Mattei. Grove, Burney, Hawkins, Rockstro, and others all make a mistake in assigning the music to Ariosti. Dr. Cummings remarked that he possessed Handel's theatre score of the music in the handwriting of his amanuensis, Smith. Here the names of the three composers are given as Pippo (Mattei), Bononcini, Handel. The opera, 'Muzio Scevola,' was not a remarkable success.

Cuzzoni was engaged in 1723 at a salary of £2,000, and three years afterwards Faustina was also engaged for a like sum. The two singers became rivals, and their respective factions indulged in the most disgraceful exhibitions of feeling. The Royal Academy of Music came to an end in 1728. The guarantee fund had been expended—some of it had only been recovered under threat of legal proceedings—and no more could be obtained. It was therefore decided to disband the association. 'The Beggar's Opera' at Lincoln's Inn Fields had undoubtedly captured a large number of persons who previously patronised the opera at the King's Theatre.

In 1729 Handel and Heidegger became partners. One of the singers engaged by them was Senesino, at a salary of 1,400 guineas for the season. The Duchess of Marlborough patronised Bononcini, and a rival opera company was established in 1732 at Lincoln's Inn Fields. When Handel's partnership with Heidegger came to an end in 1734, the rival 'Opera of the nobility' stepped in, and became Heidegger's tenants. Handel went to Lincoln's Inn Fields, and then to Covent Garden Theatre. After five years of rivalry both enterprises ceased operations, the 'Opera of the nobility' with a loss of £12,000, and Handel with a loss of £10,000.

After Handel's recovery from the illness which followed, he again essayed the production of opera, but after January, 1741, he turned his attention to the composition of oratorios. By his labours he had raised the standard of operatic music in this country to an eminence found nowhere else in Europe, except at Dresden, where Hasse was similarly engaged for a period of twenty-five years.

THE GIGUE.

At the Meeting of the Musical Association held on February 17, Mr. Jeffrey Pulver read a paper on 'The Gigue.' He claimed it as a British production, thoroughly in keeping with the traditions of the nation. Discussing the name, he said the word was found in a great many forms. Although it was the general practice to derive it from Gigue, the fiddle, he thought it was provable that the one had little or nothing to do with the other; that where the noun Gigue or Giga was used to denote the instrument, the dance sense was not applied. Similarly, those languages or dialects that used the verb giguer, meaning 'to dance,' did not have the noun at all. Summing up all the etymological evidence, Mr. Pulver was of opinion that the word Jig, meaning a dance, was traceable to a Northern source. It had nothing to do with the Giga, meaning a fiddle, the connection between the two being purely accidental.

There were two distinct varieties of the form, the English and the Italian. The figure:

formed the basis of the true English Jig, the Italian form being characterized by the prevalence of running triplets:

It was impossible to say when the first piece of music was used in this English jig form and rhythm, but probably long before it was named. The first named specimen the lecturer had been able to find was by 'Mr. W. Birde, organiste of Her Maestie's Chappell,' in 'My Ladye Nevell's Virginal Booke.'

At the middle of the 17th century the Jig began to be looked upon as a purely instrumental piece, and as soon as this use became common, the form increased in favour with the composers of the period. Soon no entertainment was complete without a Jig, plays were brought to a close with the form, the sailor's farewell to England was a Jig, and considering this, the wonder was how anyone could possibly think of the Jig as being anything but essentially English. The passing of the Crown to the House of Hanover marked the decline of the popularity of the form in England.

The Jig was introduced from England into Scotland and Ireland. The Scotch Jig is mentioned much earlier than the Irish, but if Ireland was the last to make it welcome, it was also the last to retain it in favour. To-day, the term Jig is immediately associated with the sister isle, and an 'Irish Jig' is held to be synonymous with gaiety.

Charles II. sent many of his musicians, such as Banister and Humphrey, to France, and the introduction of the Jig into that country seems to date from the period of their visit. Lully used the form, but it does not seem to have caught on greatly in France. As regards Italy there was a still greater scarcity of Giges as dances. In the case of the form that the Gigue acquired there, we must remember that the Italians had a tendency to obliterate the distinguishing rhythmic marks of the dance-forms, and nowhere was this plainer than in the Jig, which they transformed into a succession of triplets, a figure of which the Italians were fond. Riemann allows that the Gigue came to Germany from England.

The figure was retained in the Suite of a closing movement until the culminating point of the Partita's history. In Bach's day the instrumental Suite consisted of the Allemande, Courante, Sarabande, and Gigue, and when the form of the last had been sufficiently widened and extended, it was adopted in a similar capacity in the Sonata and Concerto. The Jig played a far more important part in the history of certain musical forms than it did in that of the dance; it suggested the spirit that often gave to the closing movements of the Sonata and Concerto their peculiar character.

'THE ACHARNIANS' AT OXFORD.

The choice of a Greek play by the Oxford University Dramatic Society fell this year upon 'The Acharnians' of Aristophanes, which was given in the New Theatre nightly from February 18 to 24, as well as at two matinee performances. Certain traditions have grown up round these Greek play performances by undergraduates at our Universities, and one of them is that the humour of a comedy which caricatured political and social conditions of about 400 B.C. shall be brought up to date and be turned against those of the 20th century A.D. by means of the music. One imagines that this tradition governed to some extent the choice of the O.U.D.S. this year, for while 'The Acharnians' is not in itself the most exciting of the comedies of Aristophanes, its talk of wars and rumours of wars, of 'jingoists' and peace parties, of alliances and scares of invasion, give all sorts of obvious opportunities to a composer who is out for fun. Sir Hubert Parry was certainly out for fun when he undertook to supply the necessary music. He marked down the chief points which give some sort of parallel to the politics of to-day, and he picked up a dozen or more tunes from the street, the music-hall and the opera, to become the motives of individual characters, of parties and various points of view, weaving them together into a deliciously complicated musical argument.

The play, as it was given at Oxford, includes a Prologue and two Acts. The first consists of the scene of the Assembly in which Dicaeopolis, the bucolic peasant, excellently played by Mr. D. W. Llewelyn Jones (Magdalen), protests against the continuance of war, abuses the deputies, the heralds, the ambassadors, and finally concludes a peace for himself and his family. This was preceded by an Overture in which 'An 'orrible tale I've got to tell' is answered by 'Oh dear, what can the matter be'; the warriors of Marathon and Salamis are represented by 'The British Grenadiers' and 'Rule, Britannia.' 'We don't want to fight' is combined with the martial tunes, and from amongst them all the tune of Schumann's 'Merry Peasant' (Dicaeopolis) suddenly emerges. A bit of real Parry comes in to form a contrast, and suggest 'the blessings of peace,' but soon the turmoil breaks out again. A pompous, swaggering tune which seems to remind us of some modern music (we cannot quite say what) takes possession of the score, and is proved afterwards in the course of the play to be the theme of Lamachus, the military hero whom Dicaeopolis derides. The Overture is brought to a brilliant climax by the first three notes of the National Anthem, which are the same as the opening of the Marseillaise, starting from the accent, and so we get a peace alliance or an entente cordiale.

That is largely Parry's method throughout, the entr'actes and choruses juggle with well-known tunes, punning on them so to speak. The Prelude to Act I, called 'Ancient grudges,' does funny things with growing consecutive fifths in the bass, ragtime tunes, and particularly 'Hitchy Koo.' All these find places in the choruses, which, by the way, were capitally sung even on the first night by the choir of undergraduates. Then there are tricks of orchestration, though perhaps these are not so prominent as in the music to 'The Clouds'; high flute passages over a deep-toned bass in the Overture represent our recent scare about German aeroplanes (of course the Germans equal the Spartans, and their tune is 'Die Wacht am Rhein'), the discomfort of the informed tied up with ropes is suggested by a tune in E major over a B flat pedal, the little pigs squeak on wood-wind instruments all through a minuet specially dedicated to them, and the Finale ends with half-a-dozen tunes—the 'Meistersinger' theme, the 'Marseillaise,' 'An 'orrible tale,' 'Rule, Britannia,' and a few others in most admired confusion. We had nearly forgotten to mention the waltz from 'Der Rosenkavalier,' which insinuates itself into the 'Parabasis' at the mention of flattering foreign tongues, and we have quite forgotten to mention a lot of other things which brought laughter from the audience. Dr. H. P. Allen and his orchestra did splendid work; the players revelled in the cadenza to the first Act, where each instrument is given a tune to play, and left to play it in its own way. The only limit to the fun was that some of the hearers knew more music than Greek, others more Greek than music; but a little knowledge of one combined with a bigger knowledge of the other was sufficient to give us all a good time, and of course Oxford can produce great scholars in both.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

FIRST PERFORMANCES OF 'PARSIFAL' IN LONDON.

The chief interest in the Winter German Opera Season has naturally centred upon the first stage performances of 'Parsifal' that have been given in this country. Enormous audiences have been attracted. We imagine that our readers will have been surfeited with the accounts and criticisms of the work and the manner of its presentation that have appeared in the Press; therefore we do not, at least at present, propose to discuss for the thousandth time the ethical and musical problems raised by Wagner's great work. Parsifal is sui generis. There have always been grave doubts as to its fitness for representation in the garish surroundings of an ordinary repertory opera season. It is hardly conceivable that the average opera-goer will continue to be attracted by the work. It will in the end have to create its own special audience.

Much pains had been expended on the preparation of the Covent Garden performances. Principals and orchestra were of the best procurable. We gave the cast of the first performance in our previous number. The staging had its effective moments, but it was not always adequate. The moving scenery, about which so much had been heard, excited simply mild derision. When towards the end of the journey it separated and moved in opposite directions the effect was absurd. Herr Hensel was in many respects a satisfactory Parsifal, but his voice was not blendful. Frau Von der Osten has a glorious organ—its resonance is often remarkable, and as Kundry she showed great interpretative capacity. Herr Paul Knüpfer sings very impressively, but not even his art could invest with interest the occasional wearisome garrulousness of Gurnemanz. The third Act was thrilling and exalting. Whatever of weakness may be discernible in the work, it is not to be found here. The choral singing of the Knights was fair, but not imposing. Who is responsible for the curious and absurd method of marching by fives and starts in the processional scenes? The Flower Maidens exhibited excellent voices, but their movements were somewhat restrained—a fault that may have disappeared at later performances. Herr Arthur Bodanzky showed that he is an industrious and competent conductor, if he did not betray genius.

'JOSEPH.' (MÉHUL, 1763-1817.)

It is difficult to understand why this opera was unearthed. True it had never been performed as an opera in this country, but this was scarcely an adequate reason. Still it was interesting to hear its clean-cut melodious strains and smooth Mozartean orchestration. It cannot be said that the story is particularly engrossing, and from the musical standpoint, the fact that all the chief characters were men (one, that of Benjamin, being taken by Frau Greta Jonsson) the vocal tone-colour was monotonous. Herr Plaschke was Jacob and Herr Sembach was Joseph. Mr. Percy Pitt conducted with conspicuous firmness.

The appearance of Mr. Albert Coates as conductor of 'Tristan' and 'Die Meistersinger' will be dealt with specially in our next number.

London Concerts.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The performance of 'The dream of Gerontius' given at the Royal Albert Hall under the direction of Sir Frederick Bridge on February 5, marked a further improvement in the executive ability of the Royal Choral Society and in the insight of the singers into the expressive requirements of this work. Further distinction was imparted to the occasion by the solo singing of Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Montague Borwell.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

The policy of this Society is to bring forward new works or to remedy the neglect into which some older works have fallen. In pursuance of this second design the Society chose for its concert on February 11, a Beethoven programme consisting of 'The mount of Olives' and the Mass in D. It is gratifying to record that a large audience attended, and that the work of the choir, which has never ceased to improve, showed a further access of vitality and power. Many of the choral passages in the Mass were interpreted with striking effect. Both the volume and the quality of the choral tone were always satisfactory. Mr. John Adams and Mr. Robert Maitland took solo parts in both works; Miss Gladys Moger sang in the cantata, Miss Elsa Oswald and Miss Marion Beeley in the Mass. Mr. Arthur Fagge conducted. The London Symphony Orchestra assisted.

THE ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The concert given at Queen's Hall, on February 19, had a triple distinction: Strauss's 'Ein Heldenleben' was performed under Mengelberg, Sir Charles Stanford's fourth 'Irish Rhapsody' was performed for the first time, and Mr. Leonard Borwick made his first appearance at these concerts. The Rhapsody had the refined quality characteristic of the composer's music. In terms far from elaborate, it told an interesting tale, and at all times one was impressed with the unostentatious but firm grasp of technique displayed in its outline and detail. Mr. Borwick's interpretation of Schumann's A minor Pianoforte concerto had marked character and authority.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the concert given on February 14 was one of those characteristic blends of stimulant and sedative with which Sir Henry Wood keeps his hold on the public. It opened with Strauss's Overtures to 'Der Burger als Edelmann' and 'Ariadne auf Naxos.' It was interesting to hear them apart from theatre conversation, although with their approach to the character of chamber-music they lost effect in the large hall. Stravinsky's 'Fireworks,' which then received its first performance in England, is a whirling, twisting, crackling mass of sound of that kind that Stravinsky can make better than anyone else, and a wonderful example of orchestral invention. Modern music being thus disposed of for the time, Sir Henry Wood then conducted a continually attractive performance of Beethoven's fourth Symphony, a work that rarely finds its way into a concert-programme nowadays. M. Alfred Cortot gave a poetic and vital reading of Schumann's A minor Pianoforte concerto. The concert was brought to a close with Delius's 'Dance Rhapsody.'

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

M. Mlynarski was prevented by illness from conducting the concert given by this Orchestra at Queen's Hall on January 26, and Señor Arbos was called in to fill his place. The insight, sympathy, and effectiveness of his interpretations of Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, and Brahms's 'Variations on a theme by Haydn' gave proof of his high capacity as a conductor. Mr. Paul Kochanski gave an interesting reading of Saint-Saëns's Violin concerto in B minor. Mozart's Overture 'Der Zauberflöte' opened the programme.

At the concert on February 9, Herr Steinbach was the conductor, and as the programme consisted of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony and the second Symphony and Violin Concerto of Brahms, his powers were displayed at their best. His interpretations of the Symphonies were full of vital force and expression that could be delicate or dignified, and to all his demands the Orchestra responded fully. As soloist in the Concerto, Herr Bronislaw Huberman was impeded by a defective string.

THE NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An attractive Beethoven-Wagner concert was given by this organization under Mr. Landon Ronald at Queen's Hall, on February 12. The seventh Symphony was interpreted with freshness of expression, rhythmic interest, and full beauty of tone. The Wagner orchestral excerpts were the 'Meistersinger' Overture, the 'Siegfried Idyll,' the Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan und Isolde,' and the 'Tannhäuser' Overture. Madame Kirkby Lunn sang Wagner's 'Träume' and 'Schmerzen,' and Beethoven's 'In questa tomba' and 'Die Trommel gerühret,' with notable art.

The Orchestral Concerts for Young People organized and conducted by Miss Gwynne Kimpton continue to flourish. At Æolian Hall on January 24 the programme included Tchaikovsky's 'Casse Noisette' suite, and concertos contributed by Miss Kimpton (violin), and Miss Madeline Price (pianoforte). Miss Doris Montrave sang, Mr. F. Gilbert Webb made the explanatory remarks, and Miss Julian Marshall assisted as conductor.

'Llewellyn,' a new Cantata by the rising young Welsh composer, Mr. Cyril Jenkins, was performed for the first time on January 24 by the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society under Mr. Allen Gill's direction. It has none of the antiquated phraseology usually associated with the music of the Principality; it follows up-to-date models, and contains much ambitious and effective writing. The Society also gave Max Bruch's 'The power of sound' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan.' The soloists of the concert were Miss Mary Leighton, Miss Dora Arnell, Mr. John Watkyn, and Mr. Stewart Gardner.

The fourth of Dr. R. R. Terry's Bach chamber concerts took place at Westminster Cathedral Hall on January 27. The cantatas given were 'Meine Seufzer, meine Thränen,' and 'Meine Seele ruhm't und preist.' Madame Amina Goodwin and Mr. F. A. Keene were the soloists in the Concerto in C major for two pianofortes and orchestra.

At Queen's Hall, on January 28, the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society gave an attractive concert. Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony was performed, Mr. W. H. Squire played Saint-Saëns's A minor Violoncello concerto, and Miss Ada Forrest sang.

The King was present at the Smoking Concert given by this organisation at Queen's Hall on February 18. Mr. Arthur Payne conducted, and the programme was popular and carefully chosen. A quartet of well-known vocalists sang Liza Lehmann's Cycle, 'Parody pie,' and Miss Annie Godfrey appeared as violin soloist in Wieniawski's 'Souvenir de Moscou.' Mr. Arthur W. Payne conducted on both occasions.

A concert with a programme of the usual popular and attractive character was given by the Great Eastern Railway Musical Society, at Hamilton Hall, on February 4, under the direction of Mr. William Johnson Galloway. The vocalists were Miss Dora Gibson and Miss Florence Taylor.

The programme of the concert given by the Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society at Queen's Hall on February 5 included Schumann's Symphony in D minor and Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture 'La nuit de Mai.' Mr. Hamish MacCunn conducted the orchestra, and Mr. Frank Idle the choir. Songs were given by Miss Dora Gibson.

The Strolling Players Amateur Orchestra gave renewed evidence of its high capacity at Queen's Hall on February 12. Under Mr. Joseph Ivimey's direction a performance of Mozart's D major Symphony (No. 38) was given, that left little wanting from the highest standards. Mr. Felix Salmond was soloist in Saint-Saëns's A minor Violoncello concerto, and Madame Blanche Marchesi gave songs.

Elgar's 'King Olaf' was very effectively performed by the Crystal Palace Orchestra and Choir under the direction of Mr. W. W. Hedgcock on February 14. The best features of the performance were provided by the Choir, which sang with unflinching enthusiasm, grasp of the music, and expressive force. There were good quality and balance in the tone, and many of the qualities of a thoroughly trained and well equipped choral body were constantly revealed. The solo parts were entrusted to Miss Carrie Tubb, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Norman Williams. The Orchestra, in addition to the exacting task of executing the elaborate score of 'King Olaf,' played Wagner's 'Die Meistersinger' Overture.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The performance of Schönberg's Sextet at a concert of the London String Quartet was referred to in our last issue. At the same concert, which took place at Bechstein Hall on January 23, the first performance was given of Mr. H. V. Jervis-Read's setting for four voices, with accompaniment of string quartet and pianoforte, of Maurice Hewlett's poem 'To the daughter of Earth.' This proved emotional and often picturesque and striking music. Mr. H. Waldo Warner's Phantasy in D for string quartet and Dvorák's E flat Quartet formed the remainder of the programme.

The Henkel Quartet played Pianoforte quartets by Mozart, Strauss, and Amédée Reuchsel at Bechstein Hall on January 24. At the same Hall, on January 26, the Geloso Quartet gave a new Quartet by Camille Chevillard. We understand that its key is D flat minor. César Franck's Pianoforte quintet was played, with M. Césaire Geloso as pianist.

On January 28 the British Chamber Music Players were heard at Bechstein Hall in the Pianoforte quintets of César Franck and Brahms, and Mr. Herbert Sharpe played Debussy's first set of Preludes for pianoforte.

The London Trio played works by Schubert (in E flat) and Brahms (in B) at Æolian Hall on February 2, and songs were given by Miss Ethel Maas.

Perfect performances of Beethoven's Quartet in C minor, Op. 18, Sir Charles Stanford's Quartet in G, Op. 99, and Schubert's Pianoforte trio in B flat, Op. 99 (with Mr. Richard Epstein as pianist), were given by the Rosé Quartet at Bechstein Hall on February 3. On February 11 the same players were heard in Quartets by Brahms in A minor, Beethoven in B flat (posthumous), and Mozart in D minor.

The welcome revival of the Leyton House Chamber Concerts began under the happiest auspices on February 6, for the performers were the Rosé Quartet. They played Schubert's 'Death and the Maiden' Quartet and that of Brahms in B flat. Between these works German songs were given by Mr. Robert Maitland. At the second concert of the series, on February 17, the Brodsky Quartet gave an excellent programme in conjunction with Mr. Percy Grainger.

At Bechstein Hall, on February 14, the Wessely Quartet gave the first performance of a musicianly, refined, and pleasant String quartet by M. Esposito. The programme also included Schubert's posthumous Quartet in D minor and Strauss's Pianoforte quartet, given with Mr. York Bowen as pianist.

At Steinway Hall, on February 16, the Société des Concerts Français devoted an entire evening to the music of M. Florent Schmitt. The well-known Pianoforte quintet, a work of great strength and elaboration, was finely played by the Parisian Quartet and the composer. Madame Hilda Roosevelt gave songs, and Madame Lily Henkel and M. A. Feuillard gave violin and violoncello pieces respectively, all accompanied by M. Schmitt. The qualities of imagination and invention that have helped to build M. Schmitt's reputation were seldom absent.

A 'Trio-Caprice' by Paul Juon, unfamiliar to London, was played at the Arts Centre on February 17 by Mr. Thomas Fussell (violin), Mr. Arthur Trew (violoncello), and Miss Claiborne Dixon (pianoforte). It is a work of great vitality, with a constant stream of varied and interesting, although not great ideas. The programme included a melodious Phantasy-Trio by H. Waldo Warner and a short Trio by Norman O'Neill. The playing was always of a high standard.

The Twelve o'Clock Concerts have continued their successful course at Æolian Hall on Thursdays.

RECITALS.

M. Nandor Zsolt, who gave the first performance in England of Korngold's Violin sonata at a recent meeting of the Music Club, gave a further interpretation of the work at Æolian Hall on January 23. With the assistance of Miss Daisy Kennedy (violin), Mr. Arthur Blakemore (viola), Mr. Percy Such (violoncello), and M. Benno Moiseiwitsch (pianoforte), he also introduced his Quintet in B flat minor.

Miss Elsie Horne gave a recital at Queen's (small) Hall on January 24, and again showed how high a position she holds among English pianists. At 'Cosmopolis,' on the same day, M. Nikolai Sokoloff revealed exceptional powers as a violinist.

Dr. Georg Henschel gave the first of two farewell recitals at Bechstein Hall on January 28 and made it clear that his faculties remain unimpaired. His programme was as usual a selection from German Lieder, and, as usual, he played his own accompaniments perfectly.

On January 28 Miss Madeline Royle (pianist) and Mr. Horace Fellowes (violinist) gave a concert at Æolian Hall, in the course of which two attractive violin pieces by Mr. Theodore Holland were played.

Mr. Victor Benham made his reappearance on the London concert platform with two recitals at Steinway Hall on January 30 and February 16, and interpreted pianoforte music with his familiar refinement.

Lekeu's Sonata for violin and pianoforte was given by Mr. Robert Pollack and Miss Marie Panthés at Æolian Hall on February 4. Miss Gladys Mayer (vocalist) assisted in a programme that was entirely composed of French music.

Mr. Leonard Borwick opened a series of five pianoforte recitals at Æolian Hall on February 4. His programme, which was of course admirably performed, ranged from Bach (Mr. Borwick's own transcription of the great G minor Fugue) to Ravel ('Gaspard de la nuit'). On February 11 his programme contained Ravel's 'Valse nobles et sentimentales.' On February 18 he confined himself to Beethoven.

Madame Blanche Marchesi, whose appearances on the platform as a Lieder-singer are all too infrequent, gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on February 5, before a large and delighted audience. The programme was headed 'Favourite old and modern songs.'

M. Josef Lhévinne played pianoforte works with his customary brilliance and expressiveness at Queen's Hall, on February 6. On the following day, Mr. Percy Waller, a clever pianist, gave a recital at Bechstein Hall.

Madame Lula Myszc-Gmeiner, a Lieder singer of high standing, gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on February 17, and included in her programme an interesting group of songs by Mahler.

Pianoforte recitals have been given by Mr. David Cooper (February 4), Miss Katherine Hogg (February 12), Miss Christian Carpenter (February 17), Miss Henriette Michelsen (February 17), and the pupils of the Verne Pianoforte School (January 28 and 29); a vocal recital by Miss A. von Staveren (January 27); violin recitals by Miss Katherine Kendall (February 18), and Mr. Francesco Vigliani (February 18).

The Apollo Male-Voice Quartet from Sheffield appeared at a Sunday League concert at Queen's Hall on February 15, and won universal admiration for those qualities that have made their wide reputation in the North.

Suburban Concerts.

The West Croydon and District Choral Society gave its first public performance at the Public Hall, Croydon, on January 28. The first half of the programme consisted of Spohr's 'Last Judgment,' in which the soloists were Miss Maidstone-Campbell, Miss Gertrude Wood, Mr. Arthur Dearden, and Mr. Graham Smart. The choir is to be commended for its admirable diction and clearness of attack. Miss Ethel Hopkins conducted, while Miss Lily Jones at the pianoforte and Mr. Leslie Forsaith at the organ supplied the accompaniment. In the second half the choir sang Maunders's 'Border Ballad,' Frank Idle's 'Puck is King,' and J. H. Walmisley's 'Music all-powerful.' Judging from the Society's début, there is evidently a future before it. At the next concert, in May, Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' are chosen for performance. The secretary of the Society is Mr. S. J. W. Bloxham.

Barnett's 'The Ancient Mariner' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' were given on January 28 by the East and West Molesey Choral Society, with full orchestral accompaniment, at the Conservative Hall, East Molesey. The soloists were Miss Maude Wilby, Miss Marie Pedley, Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. Jackson Potter. Miss V. S. Torckler was leader of the orchestra, and Mr. P. Macdonald conducted.

The South London Philharmonic Society gave their first concert this season at Greenwich Borough Hall on January 17, under the direction of Mr. Wilfrid Bruin. The works presented were Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-bon' Suite, and Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet,' in which the soloist was Mr. Thorpe Bates, and Grieg's Pianoforte concerto, played by Miss Edith Ashby. Choir and orchestra together numbered a hundred performers, and their work aroused the enthusiasm of a large audience.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

The Birmingham Choral Union, under Mr. Richard Wassell's able conductorship, gave a concert-recital of Edward German's Elizabethan comic opera 'Merrie England,' which filled the Town Hall on January 24. It is a popular work with the masses, and finely given as it was, it created as usual a deep impression. The choir was in excellent form and never sang better, and the principals—Madame Sadler-Fogg, Madame Nellie Pritchard, Miss Chatterley Ingram, Mr. William Burrows, and Mr. Frank Macnamara—rendered excellent service. The orchestra was in every way reliable and efficient. In the second part, which was of a miscellaneous character, Master Stanley Shale, a clever boy pianist, played Mendelssohn's 'Andante and Rondo Capriccioso' with much brilliance and with an admirable technique.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association once more relied upon 'Elijah' to draw a big audience to the Town Hall on February 14. Mr. Joseph H. Adams conducted a remarkably good performance—indeed the best this Society has given yet of 'Elijah.' The choir was in splendid form, the tone-quality quite excellent, and the principals—Madame Aimée Wathen-Cole, Miss Agnes Cockshott, Mr. Walter Ottey, and Mr. Douglas Pemberton—were satisfactory. Mr. C. W. Perkins occupied his accustomed post of organist, and the orchestra was on the whole equal to all demands.

The O'Mara Opera Company paid their first visit to Birmingham, and gave a week's operatic season at the Bordesley Palace Theatre, from February 9 to February 14 inclusive. Their chief successes were the performances of 'Maritana,' 'Il Trovatore,' and the 'Bohemian Girl,' which drew crowded popular audiences, and which much more suited their resources and equipment than Wagner's 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin.'

Mr. Max Mossel's third Drawing Room Concert of the current series was held in the Grosvenor Room of the Grand Hotel on February 12. The London String Quartet gave excellent and finished readings of Schubert's String quartet, Op. 29, No. 1, in G minor, Tchaikovsky's delightful 'Andante' from the String quartet in D major, Op. 11, and Wolf-Ferrari's early Quintet for pianoforte and strings, in D flat, Op. 6, with Mr. O'Connor Morris as pianist. The vocalist was Miss Carmen Hill, who gave songs by Hugo Wolf, Brahms, Hamilton Harty, and Graham Peel.

The great Russian pianist, M. Wassili Sapellnikov, made his first appearance at Birmingham at the Town Hall on February 7, in conjunction with the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Julian Clifford. He gave a magnificent and virile reading of Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte concerto in B flat minor, and added a group of Chopin pieces. The orchestral items comprised two movements from the 'Sleeping Beauty' Suite by Tchaikovsky, and the same composer's 'Theme with variations,' from the third Suite in G, Op. 55, excellently interpreted. The vocalist was Miss Mary Whitfield, a rising young singer, gifted with a fresh and brilliant soprano voice.

The third Harrison concert attracted an enormous audience to the Town Hall on February 2, the artists being Miss Louise Dale, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Robert Radford (vocalists), M. Hollman (solo violoncellist), Mr. Mark Hambourg (solo pianist), and Mr. R. J. Forbes (accompanist). The programme was of the ballad type, which strongly appealed to those present.

BOURNEMOUTH.

The amount of serious music that is packed into each week of the winter season is indeed phenomenal: the big cities of the kingdom, with populations seven or eight times as large as Bournemouth, do not show a greater musical activity than this South Coast resort exerts. It is indeed a remarkable manifestation of civic enterprise, revealing a spirit which is alone emulated in the enlightened centres of artistic thought on the Continent. Only as regards opera, which lies outside the domain of the municipal authorities, does stagnation prevail.

Variety, constant and sustained, is the main plank in Mr. Dan Godfrey's successful policy. Take the Symphony Concerts which have been given since our last review for an example; the list of works performed contains such diverse compositions as Beethoven's 'Leonore' Overture (No. 3) and Symphony in A; Tchaikovsky's Symphony in F; Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony; Tschérépine's melodious Prelude, 'La Princesse Lointaine' (first performance at these concerts); Elgar's 'In the South' Overture; the 'Le Carnaval Romain' Overture by Berlioz, the 'Carnival' Overture by Dvorák, Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and Frank Bridge's Suite, 'The sea' (first performance here), which the composer himself conducted very cleverly. Then the soloists, too, have selected for the greater part works out of the beaten track, as the following record will show: Miss Myrtle Meggy (Pianoforte concerto by Rimsky-Korsakov); Mr. Theo de la Rivière, of the Municipal Orchestra (Ballade for viola and orchestra, by Schubert); Mr. Alfred Kastner (Concertstück for harp and orchestra, by Gabriel Pierné, and harp solos); Mr. Robert Pollak (Beethoven's Violin concerto); and Mr. Ioan Lloyd Powell (Pianoforte concerto in C minor by Rachmaninov). On January 22 Mr. Edward German conducted two of his compositions.

An original outlook also has been manifested in the construction of the Monday 'Pops,' as one at least out of the following programmes exemplifies. The principal details are as follows: January 19, 'Beethoven-Brahms' programme, including the Brahms part-songs for female voices, two horns and harp, and the Rondo from Beethoven's Pianoforte concerto No. 1, played by Miss Nora Bradbury; January 26, 'Wagner' programme; February 2, 'The evolution of the Symphony'—single movements from Symphonies by Haydn, Beethoven, Berlioz, Spohr, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Raff, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, and Glazounov; February 10, Italian music—'William Tell' Overture (Rossini), Aria from Spinelli's 'A Basso Porto,' sung by Miss Evelyn Harding.

Other events have included an enjoyable pianoforte recital by Mr. Sydney Rosenbloom, and an orchestral concert with the veteran violoncellist, Mr. Joseph Hollman, as the central attraction. On January 23 Mr. Victor Benham, pianist, proved his claim upon our serious attention, despite some striking inequalities in his playing; and the week following Mr. Charles Fry displayed his powers to advantage in a selection of musical recitations. Miss Margaret Morris's corps de ballet—in, amongst other items, the first production of a ballet to the music of Beethoven's seventh Symphony—was an engagement of unique interest. The actual grouping of the dancers and the designs effected by the colour schemes were quite beautiful, but it is problematical whether the plan of the ballet could be considered as in conformity with the moods of Beethoven's noble music—actually, in Wagner's phrase, the 'apotheosis of the dance.' Visits have been made by Melsa, Miss Gladys Moger and Miss Ada Thomas, Mr. and Mrs. Dennis Drew, and Miss Marie Hall. The performance by the Municipal Choir and Orchestra of Coleridge-Taylor's melodious 'A tale of Old Japan,' Parry's masterly 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' and Cowen's setting of 'John Gilpin,' reflected a considerable amount of credit upon the performers and Mr. Godfrey, who directed the affair. The soloists, who also sang excerpts from Coleridge-Taylor's popular 'Hiawatha' trilogy, were Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Hilda Cragg-James, Mr. Sam Hempshall, and Mr. Julien Henry.

In addition to the above concerts we have to chronicle a wholly delightful recital by Dr. Georg Henschel at St. Peter's Hall. This latter is a much more appropriate building for such recitals and for all chamber music than the Winter Gardens Pavilion, and for this reason it is a pity, for their own sakes, that artists do not exhibit more courage in tackling the monopoly (for such it undoubtedly is) that has been set up in matters musical by the municipal authorities. This view may be construed as antagonistic to the opinion expressed at the beginning of these notes; but it is generally admitted that when all power is vested in one authority the result must necessarily be detrimental to progress, especially in artistic affairs.

BRISTOL.

The Society of Bristol Gleemen, on January 21, gave a concert at the Public Hall, Clevedon, in aid of the town cricket club. There was a large audience, which warmly recognised the efforts of the choir. Mr. C. W. Stear was conductor. 'Love in Exile,' composed for the Society by A. Morris Edwards, was a melodious example, the solo being well taken by Mr. Herbert Spiller. Songs were contributed by Miss Gwladys Carling, and Mr. Percy Lewis executed violoncello compositions with ability.

On January 26 the Clifton Quintet gave their second concert for the season at the Victoria Rooms, and performed Brahms's Sonata in F (Op. 99) for pianoforte and violoncello, Debussy's Quartet in G minor, and Dohnányi's Quintet in C minor (Op. 1). Mr. Herbert Parsons contributed with his accustomed skill three solos by Debussy.

The eleventh of Mr. Hubert Hunt's concerts of chamber music was held at the Victoria Rooms on February 2. Two Quartets were played, viz., Schumann in A (Op. 41) and Beethoven in B flat (Op. 130), the executants being Mr. Hubert Hunt and Miss Avice Sealy (violins), Miss Gladys Home (viola), and Mr. Roger Bucknall (violinello). Between the Quartets came Bach's Concerto in B flat, the players being Miss Home and Mr. Hunt (viola), Mr. Bucknall, Miss Rosa Button, Mr. Eric Luton (violinello), and Mr. C. Eyles (double-bass). The old-fashioned charm of the Bach illustration was recognised, and the large audience were evidently gratified with the concert generally.

The Bristol Symphony Orchestra were enabled at the second concert of the season, held in the Victoria Rooms on February 4, to interest a numerous audience in a programme which contained much calculated to appeal to the general hearer. The Overture to Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman,' Beethoven's fourth Symphony, and Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole' (the solo finely played by Mr. Edgar Hawke) were the principal features, and Mr. F. S. Gardner conducted these with judgment. Miss Hilda Blake was the vocalist, and her sympathetic voice was heard to advantage in Landon Ronald's 'I weep for Adonais.'

At Redland Park Hall, on February 5, the Clifton Choral Society gave a concert at which they presented Planquette's comic opera, 'Les Cloches de Corneville,' and Stanford's choral ballad, 'The Revenge.' The soloists in the opera were Miss Gladys M. Dyer (Serpolette), Miss Winifred Thomas (Germaine), Mr. Lionel Dore (Marquis and Gaspard), and Mr. A. E. Stanley Hill (Gobo and Bailie). The leader of the orchestra was Mr. Harold Bernard, Miss Hettie Applegate was at the pianoforte, and Mr. A. Ernest Hill directed the performance. Both works were effectively interpreted. The choruses were delivered with unanimity and brightness, and the orchestra did their share excellently.

The annual Post Office concert was given at the Victoria Rooms on February 6, and the thirty-fifth annual concert of the Great Western Railway Employes' Widows and Orphans' Fund was held on February 14 at Colston Hall. On both occasions there was a very large and appreciative audience. At the latter concert the Band of H.M. Scots Guards, under the direction of Mr. F. W. Wood, played effectively.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

Though musical events have not been numerous at Plymouth during the past month they have been important, and the spirit of progress has been evidenced in nearly each instance. The Misses Lily and Florence Smith secured Dr. Georg Henschel for their matinée on January 21, and the subscribers, attending in full numbers, thoroughly enjoyed a widely representative programme. The Misses Smith introduced Strauss's Sonata in E flat for violin and pianoforte.

The second Concert for violin and pianoforte (in the place of orchestra) by A. d'Ambrosio was produced by Mr. Percy Lowman and Dr. Harold Lake at their fifth annual recital on January 28, the first having also been thus produced a few years previously. Other novelties were a Theme and Variations for pianoforte, Op. 72, of Glazounov, which Dr. Lake interpreted with skill, and two songs by Dr. Lake and Gerald B. Phillips, both local musicians (sung with taste by Mrs. R. H. Wagner). Each work was an instance of originality of style.

Two important choruses were sung by the Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir (conductor, Mr. David Parkes) at their annual concert on February 4. These were Elgar's 'The Reveille' and Grieg's 'Landerkennung,' and were the most ambitious pieces in the programme. They reached the highest standard in performance. A new song by Mr. Parkes, 'A lost love,' was sung by Mr. W. Parsons, and a Romanza from an unpublished Suite for violin (his Opus 14) was played by Señor Gomez.

The Band of the R.G.A. gave an excellent account of a varied programme at the Corporation Concerts on February 7 conducted by Mr. R. G. Evans.

An organ recital by Mr. David Parkes, and anthems and choruses sung by the choir of Ebenezer Wesleyan Church, served to open a new organ in Peverell Wesleyan Church on February 11.

The D'Oyly Carte Opera Company gave a week's repertoire at the Theatre Royal from February 9.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

At the eighth and ninth Symphony Concerts, given by the Torquay Municipal Orchestra on January 21 and February 4, the chief works were Beethoven's 'Eroica' and Mozart in G minor. On the second occasion M. Zacharewitsch (violin) played the Paganini Concerto. On January 24 the boy violinist, Karékjárto, played Mendelssohn's Concerto. Mr. Basil Hindenberg was the conductor.

On January 19, Mr. S. W. A. Moyle gave a violinello recital at Exeter, the Concerto being a one-movement work by Jules de Svert. Miss Fifine de la Côte was the vocalist. At Plympton on January 21 a lecture on 'Church music,' given by Mr. R. G. Cawse, was illustrated by the choir of St. Mary's Church. A miscellaneous concert was arranged at North Tawton, on February 4, by Mr. T. Fisher, the contributors being Miss Holman, Mr. Dryland, and Mr. James (vocalists); Miss J. Crews (pianoforte); and Mr. C. G. Pike (violinello). At Barnstaple, on February 16, Miss Phyllis Lett gave a concert, assisted by Dr. H. J. Edwards, and produced an impressive song composed by him, 'A chord of love divine.' Mr. John Booth sang 'The bugles of dreamland,' a new song by Hubert Bath, a native of the town. Miss Hilda Lett and Dr. Edwards were associated in a Sonata (D minor) by Brahms.

Ivybridge Male-Voice Quartet gave a concert on February 3; the choir of Christ Church, Ellacombe, sang Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' and other pieces on February 11; and a choir at Ashwater on February 12 gave a concert assisted by a small orchestra.

CORNWALL.

Mr. G. H. Ward conducted a performance of the cantata, 'The Good Shepherd,' by the choir of Holy Trinity Church, Carnellis, on January 18. Excellent singing was heard from Gunnislake Male Choir on January 1 at a concert to which the United Methodist Church Choir contributed carols, and St. Ives Prize Male Quartet maintained their good reputation at a concert at Pendeen on January 24. Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir visited Liskeard on January 21, and sang pieces from their repertoire in aid of the local Choral Society, which is in abeyance under a heavy debt. Camborne Wesleyan Choir were conducted by Mr. H. V. Pearce, and assisted by an orchestra, at Marazion on January 28, in a performance of the 'Messiah.' The somewhat isolated situation of the small town of Looe throws the inhabitants much on their own resources for recreation, and their energy finds outlet in choral singing in more than one combination. The Male-Voice Party evidenced artistic feeling and good quality in several pieces of varied character on January 28, under their conductor, Mr. Harold Mutton. Mr. W. Brennand Smith, conductor of Tywardreath Choral Society, produced good effects from his forces in 'The Creation,' on January 29, and Mr. Hambly conducted a performance of 'From Manger to Cross,' by Calstock United Methodist Choir, on January 30. Bodmin was favoured, on February 1, with a sacred concert by St. Austell Musical Society, conducted by Mr. S. D. Collins. Another Society persevering under difficulties of location is the Lizard Choral Society, who deserved the hearty encouragement given them at a concert on February 11, and a combination which also merits recognition, Mackie's Male-Voice Choir of Delabole, were heard at Ladycross on February 12. Only two orchestral concerts have come to notice during the month, one by Mr. Barnes's Band, of Penzance, at Camborne on January 23, and another by Liskeard Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. J. Phillips at Downderry on February 11.

Mr. C. J. Bishenden gave his fifteen-hundredth concert-lecture at the College of Music, Guilford Street, W.C., on February 9. The subject was 'Dr. Boyce and singers of his time.'

DUBLIN.

Interesting recitals have recently been given under the auspices of the Royal Dublin Society. Dr. Esposito, Signor Simonetti, and Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees played Saint-Saëns's Trio in F, Schubert's Trio in E flat, and Rubinstein's Violoncello sonata in B flat. The Wessely Quartet gave the first performance of Esposito's Quartet in C minor, and were heard also in Glazounov's Quintet in A major (with Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees as second violoncello), and Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 18, No. 1. Mr. R. Goss-Custard gave an organ recital, and Sapellnikov a pianoforte recital.

At Woodbrook Saturday Recitals, the usual Trios by Dr. Esposito, Signor Simonetti, and Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees have been supplemented by the singing of Madame Kirkby Lunn, who attracted a very large audience. She was accompanied by Mr. Hamilton Harty. Much disappointment was felt at the non-appearance of Rachmaninov, who was announced for February 7. Madam Borel was the vocalist on February 14, and Mr. C. W. Wilson her accompanist. Dr. Charles Marchant gave Wagner organ recitals in St. Patrick's Cathedral on February 17 and 19. On February 18 the Dublin Orchestral Society gave their first concert for the season in the Gaiety Theatre. The programme (conducted by Dr. Esposito) included Saint-Saëns's Violoncello concerto, with Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees as soloist, Debussy's 'L'après-midi d'un Faune,' and Dvorák's Symphony, 'From the New World.'

EDINBURGH.

The last three concerts of the Paterson Orchestral series took place on January 19, January 26, and February 2. At the first of these a concert-performance was given of Wagner's 'Parsifal.' The Royal Choral Union, Madame Kirkby Lunn, Mr. John Coates, Mr. Charles Knowles, and Mr. Robert Burnett sustained the vocal parts. Emil Mlynarski conducted, and secured a very good all-round performance. The second concert was devoted to French music, with Rhené Baton as conductor. The D minor Symphony of César Franck, and the Symphonie-suite, 'Printemps,' of Debussy, were the important novelties. The last concert was on more popular lines, and included a performance of Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte concerto in B flat minor, with Josef Lhévinne as pianist.

On January 28, a harpsichord and pianoforte recital of compositions of J. S. Bach and Mozart was given in the University Class Room by Madame Landowska. This was the third of the Historical Concerts arranged by Prof. Niecks. The fourth concert, on February 11, consisted of 16th- and 17th-century English viol music and art- and folk-songs. From a long list of works performed 'Three pieces for five viols' by Anthony Holborne, and the 'Fancy for five viols' by William Young, deserve mention.

The seventh Classical Concert took place on January 29, when the Geloso String Quartet performed for the first time to an Edinburgh audience. Haydn's Quartet, Op. 64, Schumann's Op. 41, and Beethoven's Op. 18, No. 6, gave opportunities for a display of their wonderful powers in ensemble playing. Madame Bathori gave delightful readings of French and German Lieder.

On January 31, Mrs. Maitland's Choir gave performances of Bach's Cantata, 'God's time is best,' and Vaughan Williams's 'Fantasia on Christmas Carols.'

The Amateur Orchestral Society gave their second concert on February 9. This occasion was notable in that it introduced Miss Schultz, a violinist of unusual gifts, who displayed a fine technique in Mendelssohn's Concerto. A Concert-overture, 'Ellangowan,' by Charles O'Brien, a local musician, had a good reception, and showed him to be a composer of very solid attainments. Altogether this concert was more than creditable to an amateur Society.

Miss Denne Parker, a local singer and teacher of singing, gave a Lieder recital on January 24 with conspicuous success, and was ably assisted by Miss Copland (violinist) and Mr. Arnold Smith (accompanist).

GLASGOW.

At the thirteenth Classical Concert on January 27, Part I of 'Omar Khayyam' was brought to a second hearing at Glasgow. The Choral Union, under Mr. Henri Verbruggen, their conductor, tackled Bantock's enormously difficult vocal score with praiseworthy enthusiasm, and this, coupled with Mr. Verbruggen's intimate handling of the orchestra, secured an altogether commendable performance. The solo music was given by Miss Alice Lakin and Messrs. Frank Mullins and Robert Burnett.

The Bach Choir's chamber concert on January 29, with Miss Wanda Ladowska (her first appearance here) as clavicin player and pianist, proved deservedly popular. Among the most attractive numbers was a Bach Concerto, in which Miss Ladowska was associated with Miss Jenny Cullen as violinist. The last Classical Concert of the season on February 3 attracted a very large audience, doubtless because of the appearance of our townsman, Mr. Frederic Lamond, as solo pianist, who played with impressive effect Beethoven's fourth Concerto and Liszt's first Concerto in E flat. Otherwise there was no special attraction in the programme, which included Schumann's first Symphony, and numbers by Debussy and Weber. The annual plébiscite concert took place on February 6, when the selection voted showed a distinctly conservative desire to hear standard favourites. The solo vocalist was Miss Carrie Tubb. The season just closed has been remarkably successful in all respects, and not the least notable feature has been the amount of support extended to the series of concerts given by the Scottish Orchestra under the auspices of the municipality. May there be a further expansion in this direction next year, when M. Emil Mlynarski (who has been re-elected conductor) takes up the baton!

The Western Choral Union, under the able conductorship of Mr. Wilfrid Senior, gave their annual concert on February 11. A miscellaneous programme, which included Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Death on the Sierras,' Cornelius's 'The surrender of the soul,' and Morley's 'Fire, fire, my heart,' was just sufficient to test the singers' powers to the utmost, but a satisfactory performance can be recorded. The choral programme was pleasingly varied by some capital solo-singing by Misses Jean Gibson and Catherine Innes, and Mr. Appleton Moore. Miss May Senior proved herself a careful pianoforte accompanist.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

Mr. Hamilton Harty conducted the eighth Philharmonic Concert on January 27, at which M. Rachmaninov played his second Pianoforte concerto in C minor, and several of his Preludes. Mr. Harty's arresting Tone-poem, 'With the wild geese,' renewed the favourable impression made at its previous performance last season. It is music very suggestively and effectively allied with its poetic basis. In two of his Irish songs, 'The wake feast' and 'At sea,' the composer had the advantage of Miss Agnes Nicholls (Mrs. Harty) as his vocal exponent, and this admirable artist also sang three racy Irish country songs, arranged by Herbert Hughes, in which Mr. Harty's skilful pianoforte accompaniments were a feature no less than the singing. In place of a symphony, Bach's Suite in B minor for solo-flute (Mr. V. L. Needham) and string orchestra, was a delightfully played item. Under Mr. Harry Evans, the choir gave evidences of their improved method in singing Stanford's 'The Blue Bird' and Sullivan's 'O Gladsome Light.' The ninth Philharmonic Concert on February 10, at which Sir Frederic Cowen was the conductor, was devoted to two choral works—Mr. Hamilton Harty's Leeds Festival Cantata, 'The Mystic Trumpeter,' and Sir Edward Elgar's 'Caractacus.' The performance of Mr. Harty's singable, melodious and picturesquely-scored work was very well received. The solo baritone was Mr. Thorpe Bates. Mr. Harty displays constructive facility in writing for voices as well as orchestra, and his setting of Walt Whitman's uncouth poetry is extremely well conceived. It is curious that Elgar's 'Caractacus' had never previously been performed at Liverpool. Written for the Leeds Festival of 1898, immediately before the famous 'Variations,' it may not eclipse the melodic beauty of its predecessor, 'King Olaf,' but shows an advance in other directions. The composer makes large use of leading motives used with significant effect, and as an illustration of Mr. Acworth's libretto the music gives the impression of real mastery and power. A very acceptable performance was given, the vocal soloists being Miss Ruth Vincent, Mr. Walter Hyde, Mr. Thorpe Bates, and Mr. Robert Radford. The choir had evidently been well prepared, and sang with excellent intention and effect.

The steadfast support which Mr. Percy Harrison's ballad concerts receive from a numerous section of the public was shown on February 4, when a programme of fifteen items was extended into nearly double that number. The explanation is found in the names of the well-tried singers and players who took part.

The members of the Rodewald Concert Club enjoyed an interesting programme on January 26, provided by the O'Malley String Quartet, a combination of four skilful and well-unified players, who were heard in Dvorák's Quartet in E flat and Hugo Wolf's 'Italienische Serenade.' On February 9, the musicians were Miss Isabel McCullagh (violin), Miss Mary McCullagh (violinello), and Miss Helena McCullagh (pianoforte), who combined with practised skill and sympathy in Dvorák's Trio in F minor, Rabl's 'Fantasiestücke,' Op. 2, and Brahms's Trio in C, Op. 87.

Mr. Michael Balling conducted the fine performance given by the Hallé Orchestra on February 7, when two compositions of compelling interest were played. These were Korngold's 'Overture to a drama,' and Maurice Ravel's Orchestral Suite 'Ma mère l'Oye,' a series of dainty movements in piquant rhythms—suggestively scored. Korngold's music made an immediate impression. Not only as the work of a wonder-boy of fourteen, it is remarkable for its wealth of ideas, maturity of expression, and glowing orchestration. It was followed by a not particularly arresting performance of the 'Pathetic' Symphony, and by Liszt's E flat Pianoforte concerto, in which Miss Susanne von Morvay played brilliantly.

The Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra Concerts continue to receive satisfactory support which they well merit. On January 20 Beethoven's seventh Symphony was played, and a remarkably fine performance of Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte concerto in B flat minor was given by Miss Tina Lerner. Mlle. Chaminade's Orchestral suite 'Callirhoë' was a delightful example of the work of this gifted composer, and Miss Agnes Nicholls in her songs completed the interest and importance of the feminine element in the programme. At the fifth concert, on February 3, Mr. Akeroyd submitted Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' Overture—in which the fine orchestra were heard less advantageously than in Dvorák's 'Carnival' Overture and Saint-Saëns's 'Le Rouet d'Omphale.' Mlle. Renée Chémet, the brilliant solo violinist, had a congenial opportunity in Saint-Saëns's Concerto in B minor, No. 3. The vocalist was Mr. Fraser Gange, who sang a new song-cycle, 'Hips and Haws,' by Madame Liza Lehmann.

Owing to the phenomenal success of the performances of the Moody-Manners Opera Company in Kelly's Theatre, their season was extended to seven weeks with the prospect of an early return visit. The production of Kienzl's Opera, 'Der Kuhreigen,' on January 23, aroused considerable interest. The work was quite new to this country, although Kienzl is not altogether a stranger to England, for his previous opera, 'Der Evangelimann,' was given at Covent Garden as far back as 1897. 'Der Kuhreigen'—or, to use the alternative English title Mr. Charles Manners has adopted, viz., 'The dance of death'—is a work which will probably be taken into favour in this country, for it contains some very melodious numbers and effective ensembles which are handled with dramatic feeling and skill. There is a personal note in the music which is less obviously Wagnerian than in the case of other contemporary composers, and the lighter numbers, such as the Gavotte in the second Act and the Mozartean Minuet ('The dance of death') in the last Act, are graceful and attractive.

The opera was very well staged, and the drunken orgies of the revolutionary mob in the final act were realistically presented. The principal characters, which included Madame Fanny Moody, who made a welcome reappearance, were vocally a strong and competent cast. The orchestral features of the clever score were not so fully realised; it is a department of this company which obviously needs strengthening.

Conducted by Mr. Albert Orton, the Walton Philharmonic Society inaugurated its fifth season on January 28, by a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and Elgar's Choral suite, 'From the Bavarian Highlands.' In these attractive works the choir of eighty voices sang extremely well, and thanks to Mr. Orton's enterprise, a small orchestra of Hallé players, led by Mr. J. E. Matthews, very materially assisted in the accompaniments. The vocal principals were Miss Alice Shawcross, Miss Annie Beattie, Mr. Lloyd Moore, and Mr. W. Batey, principal bass at Hereford Cathedral. Dr. Stanley Dale presided at the pianoforte.

Dr. Brodsky selected Schubert's posthumous Quartet in G minor, Beethoven's Quartet in C sharp minor, Op. 131, and Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor, Op. 25 (in which Miss Marguerite Stilwell showed interpretative skill as pianist), for his concert on January 24, and as usual the quartet-playing was heard with keen enjoyment. Interesting chamber concerts were also given by the Misses Helena, Isabel and Mary McCullagh on January 19, and by the Prescott Trio (Mr. Arthur Catterall, Mr. E. A. Wright, and Mr. Stanley Prescott) on January 28. The programme of the former concert included Schumann's 'Spanisches Liederspiel' and Brahms's 'Zigeunerlieder,' sung by Miss Edith McCullagh, Miss Helen Anderton, Mr. Roland Jackson, and Mr. Francis Harford. The Prescott Trio introduced two interesting works in Gabriel Fauré's Pianoforte quartet in C minor and Sir Charles Stanford's Pianoforte quartet in F, in which the players were reinforced by Mr. F. Weingaertner (viola). Another outstanding occasion was the successful pianoforte recital given on January 31 by Mr. Frederic Lamond, who especially made good his fame as a Beethoven player par excellence in the Thirty-two Variations and Sonata in C, Op. 2, No. 3.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

In recent months our concert-goers have gained from the example of Sir Henry Wood some insight into the difficult art of programme drafting. If there was new, good music to float on the waters of public appreciation, Sir Henry took care that it was done when some other item in the scheme would ensure the new music's message reaching the biggest possible multitude. In some aspects Balling would appear to have been cast in the Richter mould. Early he demonstrated the same ultra-severe tastes in framing Hallé programmes. Like his great exemplar he let the newer music take its chance; hence, many poor houses—only three crowds in the first ten concerts! With the New Year came a welcome change of attitude, and every concert since the recess has seen almost an ideal union of great, varied, attractive music played with the utmost enthusiasm to big audiences, a policy which has had a most heartening effect upon all concerned.

As an instrument of eloquently expressive power, the Hallé Orchestra has been greatly enriched under Balling's guidance; but the choir has not shown the same swiftness of response to the higher emotional effects now so frequently attained. Given such a work as the ninth Symphony, something that it can 'leather,' and its numerical and tonal strength stands it in good stead. But Brahms's 'Schicksalslied' (on January 22) was another matter, and I do not easily recall any occasion when the disparity between orchestra and choir in artistic perceptive power was so acutely revealed.

After rehearsals that, at a liberal estimate, could not exceed eight hours, Bach's B minor Mass was performed on February 5. Need there be any surprise that the singing never rose above mediocrity! When will chorus-master, conductor, and executive bring to an end this lamentable state of affairs which deems such meagre preparation adequate for the presentation of the greatest work of its type in choral literature?

The Roger-Ducasse items were of much more solid worth than the same composer's 'Suite française' introduced by Balling last season.

The new music introduced at the Hallé concerts in the past month has included Strauss's 'Aus Italien' and 'Festliches Praeludium,' Balakirev's 'Spanish march' Overture, and a Sarabande and Scherzo of Roger-Ducasse.

The 'Sarabande' is almost a symphonic-poem with vocal colour added. It appears to be based on a mediæval French chronicle, which records the desire of an abbot for the playing of 'that Sarabande, which was a Spanish dance that a lute player whom he loved used to play very beautifully; and as he gently left this life all the road that leads to the Abbey was filled with viols and hautboys d'amour and flutes playing the Sarabande, together with the psalms of priests and clerks and the many lamentations of good people who wept and mourned most sadly. At the same time all the bells, great and small, rang out and chimed most melodiously.' The supplementary choir chanting on the syllable 'Ah' against the veiled, sad, cloistral harmonies gently swaying to and fro, was not sufficiently remote. It was the sort of effect that in, say, Gloucester Cathedral, with the choir-boys up in the triforium, would have been perfectly ravishing. Written in 1910, it would probably not have taken quite its present form had not Debussy's 'Images' successfully exploited the beauties of such procedure in the matter of vocal colour. The Scherzo is in the well-known 'L'Apprenti Sorcier' manner of Paul Dukas.

Apart from these orchestral works, the greatest interest in the musical life of the month was aroused by the appearances, at only a fortnight's interval, of the two Russian pianists, Rachmaninov and Siloti, and by the instructive comparison thus afforded. The former had never been to Manchester before, and during his two days' stay played nothing but his own works, ranging from the (by him obviously despised) C sharp minor Prelude, through the more extended forms to the Sonata and his second Pianoforte concerto. Siloti's programme included Liszt's 'Todtentanz,' which he has popularized everywhere, and Schubert's 'Wanderer' Fantasia.

At a Brodsky concert on January 31 were heard Brahms's early B flat Sextet, and the last movement of a new Sonata by Sylvio Lazzari, in which Mr. R. J. Forbes joined Dr. Brodsky. The chamber concerts of Max Mayer (January 26) and Miss Edith Robinson (February 2) introduced new music of distinction by Reger and Chevillard.

The second municipal 'Hallé' orchestral concert consisted mainly of well-known works of Beethoven, Liszt, and Wagner. Stimulated, doubtless, by the success of these two concerts, other Societies are offering the Town Hall Committee their services for next season, the Gentlemen's Glee Club and the Manchester Vocal Society being among the number. The latter Society, on January 21, gave a concert which may safely be reckoned as being the most satisfactory yet given under Mr. Whittaker's guidance, the advanced programme being well done and still better appreciated.

Glee clubs meeting for social-cum-musical enjoyment are tolerably numerous here. One of the most recently established is the 'Cantori' Society, now in its ninth year, conducted by Mr. J. B. Cullen. One does not usually associate Schumann, Wolf, Brahms, Cornelius, or Elgar with such assemblies, even on a 'ladies' evening,' and the eighty members of the 'Cantori' may be congratulated as a body 'who study part-singing purely for their own edification.'

The third Harrison concert on February 3 was, so far as can be learned, the only 'ballad' concert of this winter held, at any rate, in the heart of the city. Occasion is found now and then for the Hallé Orchestra to visit centres in a speculative way at the entire risk of the Hallé Executive. Curiosity to see the fruits of such a policy took me to Preston on February 6, when a purely orchestral programme was given in the Public Hall, a building of such enormous size as to warrant the issue of tickets at somewhat less prices than obtain at either Manchester or Liverpool. The popular parts were very well patronised, and one may hope Preston's appetite for the best orchestral music was whetted, despite the gloomy assertions that Preston is 'not really musical.'

Much has appeared in the Press of the way in which the famous Manchester antiquary, the late Dr. Henry Watson, outwitted everybody in securing for the City the old viol-dagamba manuscript book belonging to the Puritan period. Dr. T. Lea Southgate, on February 6, lectured at the Royal College here on the contents, numerous solos being played by Miss Hélène Dolmetsch, and, amongst other interesting items, Sir Frederick Bridge's choral arrangement of the 'Bowe Bells' carol, with organ and carillon accompaniment, was performed.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The Bingham Choral Society gave as their sixteenth annual concert, a performance of 'Les cloches de Corneville,' arranged for concert purposes. The leading parts were taken by Miss Lilian Clayton, Miss Jessie Green, Mr. John Hinde, Mr. Charles Keywood, and Mr. George Squires. Mr. Frank Taylor conducted, and Messrs. C. Doncaster and S. H. Squires were responsible for the accompaniments. A selection of miscellaneous items completed the performance of an interesting and successful programme. The concert of unaccompanied part-songs annually provided by the William Woolley Choral Society is reported in our supplement The Competition Festival Record.

The combined efforts of Mr. Mark Hambourg and Miss Ada Crossley proved a very attractive feature on January 21, and an enjoyable concert was provided by Messrs. M. and H. Hopewell (pianist and vocalist) on January 28.

Sullivan's 'The Martyr of Antioch' and Bach's 'Jesu, Priceless Treasure' formed the programme of the Sacred Harmonic Society's concert on February 12, when the choir gave fine interpretations of both works. The absence of accompaniment in the Bach motet put them to a severe test, but they came through their difficulties, despite hazardous moments, with great credit to themselves and their conductor. Excellent work was also done by the soloists, Miss Laura Evans Williams, Miss Joan Ashley, Mr. Ivor Walters, and Mr. Bridge Peters.

The Long Eaton Orchestral Society gave their second concert of the season under the direction of Mr. Fred Mountney on February 24, when the programme included two movements from Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony, and Bantock's Serenade for strings. Solos were supplied by Miss Phyllis Lett (contralto) and Mr. John Dunn (violin).

On February 4, the visit of Rachmaninov proved a great treat, though he was only heard in compositions by himself. Miss Lucy Gates and Mr. Gervase Elwes were acceptable vocalists, and Prof. Georg Wille proved an admirable violoncellist. Mr. F. Kiddle was an ideal accompanist.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

Orchestral activities have largely monopolised the musical doings of the past month. The Sheffield Amateur Instrumental Society gave a concert with a programme of popular works under a new conductor, Mr. Alfred Barker, who succeeds Mr. Frederick Dawson. Mr. Barker, a clever violinist well known at Sheffield and Manchester, proved himself a capable and inspiring director of amateur orchestral performers. That he and his forces came so near to conquering the complexities of the Overture to 'Die Meistersinger' was a creditable achievement. The Symphony was Mozart's 'Jupiter,' of which a well-prepared performance was given. Bach's Violin concerto in A minor was played in elevated style and with well-modelled phrasing by Dr. Adolph Brodsky.

The Wagner programme chosen for the third Sheffield Promenade Concert served to reveal the steady improvement in the tone and ensemble of the orchestra that comes from rigid selection and frequent rehearsal. Mr. Cecil Baumer played MacDowell's D minor Pianoforte concerto, and a number of Lieder were tastefully sung by Miss Lucie Rosenberg to Mrs. Mountain's accompaniment. Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted.

A Symphony Concert was given at the Lyceum Theatre, by the Yorkshire Permanent Orchestra from Harrogate, under the direction of Mr. Julian Clifford. A temperate and well-controlled performance of Beethoven's Symphony in C minor was given. Mr. Clifford played very neatly, as soloist, in his own cheerful and brief Pianoforte concerto, and the Orchestra was also heard in Liszt's Rhapsody No. 1, and Weber's 'Oberon' Overture.

The Chesterfield and District Musical Union gave a concert of lighter music than usual in the Drill Hall on February 18. The versatility of the choir was tested in contrasts of manner and perspective in Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' and Hubert Bath's 'Wedding of Shon Maclean' respectively. The transition from sympathy to broad humour was admirably managed by the brilliant and responsive choir. The soloists were Miss Mary Leighton, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. Henry Brearley, and Mr. Charles Tree. Mr. J. F. Staton conducted.

An excellent and successful series of performances in the Albert Hall of German's 'Tom Jones' by the Sheffield Teachers' Opera Society were prepared and directed with much ability by Mr. J. Duffell. An interesting joint-recital by Miss Daisie Evans, an expressive contralto singer, and Mr. Horace Fulford, an able pianist, should also be recorded.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

The outstanding event at Leeds during the past month has been the visit of Mr. Landon Ronald and his New Symphony Orchestra at the Philharmonic Concert on February 4. As is usually the case when a crack orchestra comes into the provinces, a programme was arranged which was so familiar to the players that the conductor was able to get the very last ounce out of them, and accordingly we had some phenomenally brilliant performances, that of the well-known Variations from Tchaikovsky's Suite in G being perhaps the most striking as a sample of orchestral virtuosity. Beethoven's fourth Symphony and the Carneval Overtures of Berlioz and Dvorák were also up to the high standard of the Orchestra, and most remarkable delicacy was shown in some of Schubert's 'Rosamunde' music. The Philharmonic Choir was inspired to even greater brilliance than usual in Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' and, under Mr. Fricker, sang Cornelius's 'Love, I give myself to thee' very sympathetically. The Saturday Concert on February 7 was one of the best of this series. Kalinnikov's G minor Symphony was new to Leeds, and its very considerable charm was well brought out by Mr. Fricker. Mr. Alex. Cohen, the leader of the Orchestra, undertook the solo part in Max Bruch's popular Violin concerto in the same key, and has never been heard to greater advantage, his tone and execution being excellent, and his reading of the sensuously beautiful music being highly sympathetic and sensitive, yet without exaggeration. The 'Danse Macabre' of Saint-Saëns, the 'Finlandia' of Sibelius, and the great 'Leonora' Overture were other features of an interesting programme. The vocalist was Mr. Joseph Ireland, a young bass of great promise, possessing a voice of unusually rich and sympathetic quality. Harking back, the preceding concert of the same series, on January 24, was distinguished by the very artistic performance of another Leeds musician, Mr. Herbert Johnson, who gave a reading of the solo part in Beethoven's fourth Pianoforte concerto that was at once most brilliant, refined, and sympathetic. Bach's fourth 'Brandenburg' Concerto, Tchaikovsky's first (D minor) Suite, and the 'Angel' pantomime music from 'Hänsel und Gretel' were other features of the concert. Mr. Fricker, who conducted on both these occasions, was successful in obtaining very artistic and satisfying performances.

At the Leeds Bohemian Concert on January 28 Beethoven's so-called 'Harp' Quartet (Op. 74), Schubert's A minor Quartet, and Tanéïev's powerful Quartet in B flat minor formed the programme, and were played with admirable spirit by Mr. Cohen, Mr. Ghent, Miss Lily Simms, and Mr. Hemingway. On January 20 Miss Marion Keighley Snowden and her brother, Mr. John Keighley Snowden, gave an enjoyable recital of pianoforte and violoncello music. Miss Snowden is a pianist of great refinement and sincere charm, and her interpretation of five pieces by Debussy was most sympathetic. Mr. Snowden, a scholar of the R.C.M., is already a very accomplished violoncellist, and the fire he put into his performance of Bach's Suite in G gave it great vitality. The two artists joined in giving Sonatas by Beethoven and Richard Strauss, and in these also they left a most pleasant impression.

Messrs. Richardson and Maude gave one of their Sonata Recitals on January 21, playing Sonatas for pianoforte and violin by Beethoven (in G, Op. 30), Dvorák (in G, Op. 100), and Sinding (Op. 27); and on February 7 Miss Lilian Prust gave a pianoforte recital, with an ambitious programme, of which Franck's Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue was the most interesting feature. On February 10 M. Sapellnikov, who is a favourite with the Leeds public, appeared at one of the Leeds Musical Evenings to give a pianoforte recital, his powerful and brilliant performance of Liszt's B minor Sonata and Schumann's 'Etudes Symphoniques' being a noteworthy feature, while he produced a great sensation by his tremendously forceful playing of Chopin's well-known Polonaise in A flat. On the preceding evening he had given a similar recital at Harrogate.

For a whole twelvemonth the organ of the Leeds Parish Church has been undergoing reconstruction by Messrs. Harrison, of Durham, and on January 25 the finished work was rededicated. Since then recitals have been given by the organist, Mr. W. H. Williams (January 28), his predecessor, Dr. Bairstow, now of York Cathedral (January 31), and Dr. Alcock (February 11), whose uniformly interesting programmes exhibited the resources of this fine instrument, to which, among other things, an echo or 'altar' organ has been added that is capable of some beautiful effects.

BRADFORD.

At Bradford the subscription concert on January 30 introduced M. Rachmaninov as pianist and composer, and he played a number of his own compositions, including a strenuous Sonata in B flat minor, with remarkable vitality and crispness of style. Mr. Felix Salmond gave violoncello solos with splendid fire, and Miss Ruth Vincent was the vocalist. The next concert of the series, on February 13, introduced Berlioz's 'Requiem,' which had not been heard at Bradford since 1887. On this occasion it had the advantage of the co-operation of the Hallé Orchestra, under Mr. Balling, and the Festival Choral Society, and the result was an excellent all-round performance, though one could not but feel that the music failed to produce its full effect in the concert room, and especially in one which is so singularly devoid of resonance as St. George's Hall. A very fine performance of Beethoven's C minor Symphony preceded the 'Requiem.'

At the third of the Free Chamber Concerts, on February 16, Dvorák's String quartet in E flat (Op. 51), Mozart's Pianoforte quartet in E flat, and Sinding's picturesque Pianoforte quartet in E minor, were given by Messrs. Norton, Burfield, Turner, and Drake, with Mr. Midgley as pianist. Miss Judson was the vocalist. At a sonata recital on January 28, given by Mrs. Maria Herz, she was joined by Mr. I. W. Sugden in introducing Korngold's recent Sonata for pianoforte and violin in G, which had not before been heard in Yorkshire, and afforded a fresh proof of the precocious mastery of its composer. Miss Madge Whitaker was the vocalist. The programme of the Bradford Permanent Orchestra on February 14, included Brahms's 'Academic' Overture, Tchaikovsky's 'Capriccio Italien,' and Grieg's 'Sigurd Jorsalfar' Suite, of which Mr. Walter Haigh, who conducted, gave a straightforward reading. Mr. F. Mercer played the solo part of Beethoven's C minor Pianoforte concerto, and Miss Phyllis Lett was the vocalist.

OTHER TOWNS.

At the Wakefield Chamber Concert on January 22, Miss Agnes Nicholls and Mr. Hamilton Harty gave a most enjoyable song recital. Miss Nicholls sang a long and varied series of songs, including two new ones by Mr. Harty, 'The Wake Feast' and 'A Rann of Wandering,' both on Irish themes, and characterized by great force and impressive rhythm. Mr. Percy Sharman's chamber concert at York, on January 26, introduced new Pianoforte quartets, Schumann's charming work in E flat, and Gabriel Fauré's Quartet in C minor, which, though evincing the highest accomplishment, somehow fails to move one. Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins was artistically played by Mr. Sharman and Miss Leila Willoughby, and Mrs. Burrell, the vocalist, introduced two of Beethoven's arrangements of Scottish songs, with the original accompaniments for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, which she sang in sympathetic style. The other members of the quartet were Miss Knocker, Mr. Groves, and Mr. Padel. At Mr. Hylton Stewart's Chamber Concerts at Scarborough, on January 21, the Leeds String Quartet (Mr. Cohen, Mr. Ghent, Miss Simms, and Mr. Hemingway) played Beethoven's 'Harp' Quartet and Schubert's A minor Quartet very acceptably, and Miss Elsie Suddaby, a promising young soprano, was the vocalist. At the next of these concerts, on February 18, Mr. Edgar Drake's Quartet, with Mr. Percy Richardson as pianist, played Pianoforte quintets by Schumann and Brahms.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.
Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERFELDY.—The Choral Society gave their first concert of the season on January 30 with a most successful performance of Sir Edward Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' the difficulties of which were well overcome, the Epilogue being sung with dignity and power. The second part of the concert consisted of a miscellaneous selection, the choir singing Hatton's 'Belfry tower,' and other works. The vocal soloists were Miss Kate Wallace and Mr. Elliott Sharp (vocalists), and Mr. Ian Menzies played a violoncello solo. Mr. James Callow was the conductor.

AYR.—A highly creditable performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was given by the Choral Union on January 29, under the direction of Mr. Wilfrid E. Senior. An orchestra accompanied, and solo parts were taken by Miss Jean Gibson, Miss Catherine Innes, Mr. John Jamieson, and Mr. A. Richards. The second part of the programme included Mozart's 'Magic Flute' Overture and movements from Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony, played under the direction of Mr. Henri Verbrugghen.

COLERAINE.—The members of the Coleraïne Orchestral Society gave their annual concert in the Town Hall, Coleraïne, on January 22, before a very large and enthusiastic audience. The orchestral items were conducted by Mr. W. Mallinson, and represented composers of the English, French, German, and Russian schools. 'Andante Cantabile' from Tchaikovsky's Symphony Op. 64, No. 5, was played for the first time in the North of Ireland. Miss McKisack and Mr. J. McLean were the vocalists, and Miss Lynn and Mr. W. F. Wood were the accompanists.

DARWEN.—In aid of the Nursing Association and Society for the Blind, the Blackburn Ladies' Choir gave a concert here on January 27, under the direction of Mr. F. Duckworth. The programme included Bantock's 'The happy Isle' and 'Soul star,' Weelkes's 'Though my carriage be but careless,' and Mr. Duckworth's 'The stars are with the voyager.' The singing was worthy of the reputation of the choir. Solos were given by Mrs. Walter Briggs (pianist) and Mr. Bridge Peters (vocalist).

DUNFERMLINE.—Under the auspices of the Carnegie Dunfermline Trust, a highly successful performance of Coleridge-Taylor's Cantata, 'A tale of Old Japan,' was given in St. Margaret's Hall by the Trust Choir, assisted by the Scottish Orchestra, led by Mr. Henri Verbrugghen. The soloists were Miss Caroline Hatchard (who at short notice took the place of Miss Agnes Nicholls), Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Robert Burnett. The second part of the concert was miscellaneous, and included the first performance in Scotland of Granville Bantock's new Suite for strings, 'Scenes from the Scottish Highlands.' Mr. David Stephen, the director of music to the Carnegie Dunfermline Trust, conducted the whole performance.

HYPHE.—The second concert of the eleventh season of the Hythe Choral Society took place on January 21, when the programme consisted of Van Bree's Cantata, 'St. Cecilia's Day,' four movements from Schubert's Octet for strings and wind, and Mendelssohn's 'Loreley.' The soloist was Miss Dorothy Gandy, Mr. A. T. Dixon was principal violin, and Dr. A. T. Froggatt conducted.

IPSWICH.—The first concert of the season given by the Ipswich Choral Society was of excellent quality, for the works chosen were Elgar's 'The Music Makers' and Parry's 'The Pied Piper,' and the performances were fully adequate. The choral-singing was both expressive and spirited, good support being given by the orchestra. Miss Phyllis Lett was the soloist in Elgar's Cantata, and the Rev. Father Walker and Mr. Joseph Cheetham gave the solos in the work of Parry. At the conclusion of the concert a presentation clock was handed by the Mayor to the conductor, Mr. W. Hockey, in recognition of his services during the past nine years.

JOHANNESBURG.—The Johannesburg Philharmonic Society gave a performance of 'The Messiah' on December 17, under the direction of Mr. Laurence R. Glenton, when the choral-singing attained a high standard of effectiveness. The soloists, who gave an excellent reading of their respective parts, were Miss Blodwen Hopkins, Miss Eva Nodes, Mr. J. Moore, and Mr. J. W. Birrell.

NEWCASTLE, STAFFS.—The concert given by the Male-Voice Glee Union on February 12 provided the first performance of a choral ballad by the conductor, Mr. S. E. Lovatt. It is a vigorous setting of Byron's 'Sennacherib,' and achieved great success. The remainder of the programme, which was admirably carried out, included Reger's 'Love's message,' Elgar's 'It's oh! to be a wild wind,' and Sullivan's 'The long day closes.' Miss Phyllis Lett and Mr. Harold Wilde sang, and Miss Backsheen Wood contributed violin solos.

NORTH WALSHAM.—The North Walsham Amateur Musical Society, which dates back to 1872, gave a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' on February 11, under the direction of Mr. A. S. Wilde. In its efficiency and expressiveness the choral-singing was highly creditable. The solo parts were taken by Miss Margaret Layton, Miss Florence Taylor, Mr. Hubert Baker, and Mr. Walter Ivey.

PERTH.—The concert given by Mr. Richardson's Choral Society at the City Hall, on January 30, gained special interest from the first performance in Scotland of Paul Puget's 'Ulysses and the Sirens.' It was sung excellently, and made a good impression. The principal soloists were Miss Doris Carter, Miss Helen Blain, and Mr. W. Davidson. The orchestra contributed independent numbers, including Smetana's 'Bartered Bride' Overture, and the choir gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'Beside the ungathered rice' and other part-songs. Mr. Richardson conducted.

TORONTO.—At a concert of the National Chorus given under the direction of Dr. Albert Ham, the programme included Coleridge-Taylor's 'Sea Drift,' the performance of which was the chief feature of the evening.

VENTNOR.—The Musical Society gave a performance of 'Judas Maccabæus' before a crowded audience at the Town Hall on January 28. The excellence of the choral-singing did great credit to the work of Mr. Evan Jones as conductor, and in all directions the occasion was successful.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

At the Opéra has been produced a Ballet in two Acts by M. G. Bernard, 'Philotis, danseuse de Corinthe,' the music by Philippe Gaubert. The score, not very original, is graceful and pleasing. The staging and dancing offer no special feature of interest. The principal rôles are held by Mlle. Zambelli, Mlle. Urban, and M. Aveline. M. Henri Büsser conducts.

A new Concert Society has been founded by M. Pierre Monteux, with the object of providing good orchestral music at popular prices. Its concerts take place on Sunday afternoons; so that there are at present five orchestral concerts, and at times six, every Sunday, whereas during week-days it is almost impossible to hear symphonic music at Paris. The first of M. Pierre Monteux's concerts was devoted to works by MM. Paul Dukas, Debussy, by Mozart, Beethoven, Chabrier, and Berlioz; the second, entirely to the French school, the principal numbers being Maurice Ravel's 'Valse nobles et sentimentales,' Florent Schmitt's 'Tragédie de Salomé,' and songs by Duparc. The vocalist was Mlle. Suzanne Vorska.

At the Concerts-Séchiari was given, for the first time at Paris, Serghei Liapounov's 'Rhapsody on Ukrainian themes' for pianoforte and orchestra. The soloist was M. Robert Schmitz.

The Concerts-Lamoureux have provided few novelties during the month; the only noteworthy number consisted of two excerpts from the Ballet score, 'Orphée,' by Roger-Ducasse.

At the same concerts has been given a second performance of Mahler's fourth Symphony. In the French periodical, S.I.M., M. Vincent d'Indy passes the most contemptuous judgment upon this work, which he describes as a model of platitudes and bad taste.

Joan Manen's Tone-poem 'Juventus,' written in the shape of a Concerto-grosso for orchestra, two violins, and pianoforte, has been produced with moderate success at the Concerts-Hasselmans. The author, who is a gifted violinist, played the same evening Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole.' The concert was conducted by M. Wurmser; the following one, by M. Henri Morin.

At the Concerts-Colonne was played by Madame Caponsacchi - Jeissler, a 'Fantaisie-Stück' (sic) by Théodore Dubois.

On February 9 Miss Arnolde Stephenson gave a remarkably good concert, at which she sang, besides numbers by Purcell, Carissimi, Bach, and modern songs by Koehlin, Aubert, Duparc, Richard Strauss, three impressive 'Incantations' by the Russian composer Serghéi Vassilenko.

M. Inghelbrecht has founded an 'Association Chorale Professionnelle,' of which Paris stood in great need. The first concert given by the Association, which comprised music by Jannequin, Monteverde, Bach, Moussorgsky, Borodin, Debussy, and others, was extremely satisfactory, and its success led to its being repeated the following week.

The Société Nationale's doings for the month have been moderately interesting: a good performance of M. Ravel's String quartet and excellent readings by Madame Paule de Lestang of songs by Stravinsky, Liapounov, and Charles Bordes are all there to record.

The Société Indépendante has provided an interesting String quartet by Henri Cliquet, a newcomer not yet twenty. At the same concert was played for the first time at Paris, Miklos Radnai's fine Pianoforte trio, a talented Russian singer, Madame Moussatova-Kouljenko, sang a scene from Moussorgsky's unpublished opera 'Salammbô,' and Mlle. Juliette Meerovitch won golden opinions for her excellent performance of pianoforte pieces by M. Albert Bertelin.

Arnold Schönberg's Pianoforte pieces, Op. 19, appear to be gaining ground at Paris: a fortnight after their introduction by M. Léo Ornstein, they were played again, this time by M. Alfred Casella.

The concert of modern Italian music announced in the February issue did not fulfil expectations, and from the works produced (whose authors are MM. Bastianelli, Pizzetti, Ferranti, Malipiero, Davico, Tommasini) it is obvious that the young Italians, before they succeed in their laudable object of endowing their country with a repertoire of high-class instrumental music, have a good deal to learn. A song 'I Pastori,' by M. Pizzetti, was by far the best number. Miss Una Fairweather, MM. Plamondon, Koubitsky, and Casella, and the Quatuor Vuillaume carried out the programme excellently.

The Revue Française de Musique is giving a series of lectures and concerts devoted to the contemporary schools of Europe. The programmes, which range from Vincent d'Indy to Schönberg, and from Albeniz to Kodaly, include many works not yet heard at Paris. The British school is represented by Messrs. Holbrooke, Cyril Scott, Balfour Gardiner, and Norman O'Neill.

Particular interest attached to the concert given on February 19 by the Société des Amis des Cathédrales, at which was given, after works by Bach, Sweelinck, Gigault, and Josquin Desprès, Marc-Antoine Charpentier's newly-rediscovered 'Judicium Salomonis,' a superb motet written in 1702.

M. Paul Stuart, stage-manager of the Opéra, has died suddenly. He has been succeeded by M. Labis.

Two lectures, entitled 'Some thoughts for the teacher,' were given by Mr. Stewart Macpherson at the Duke's Hall, Royal Academy of Music, on January 28 and February 4.

Foreign Notes.

AMSTERDAM.

Chausson's 'Symphonie poétique,' Florent Schmitt's 'La tragédie de Salomé' (conducted by Alphonse Catherine) and Glière's 'Les Sirenes,' and works by Brahms and Richard Strauss (conducted by G. Schneevoigt), were given at the Concertgebouw.

ANTWERP.

A recent programme of the Société des Nouveaux Concerts, of which Felix Weingartner was the conductor, included his 'Lustige' Overture, Berlioz's 'Harold in Italy' and Korngold's 'Overture to a tragedy.'—The Flemish Opera produced a new lyrical drama 'Alcée,' with libretto and music by August Dupont.

BERLIN.

A Brahms concert was given under the baton of the celebrated Brahms conductor, Fritz Steinbach. The programme consisted of the Concerto for violin, violoncello and orchestra (with Hubermann and Hugo Becker as soloists), the Violin concerto, and the Symphony in D. —Jascha Spivakovski's pianoforte recital included a performance of the seldom-heard 'Concerto without orchestra,' by Schumann.—'Musik für Orchester,' by R. Stephan, and 'Sinfonischer prolog,' by Boehe, were the novelties of the third Hausegger concert.—The sixteen-year-old Austrian, Georg Szell, has made his appearance as composer, conductor and pianist, with the Blüthner Orchestra. He conducted his Symphony in B minor, and played Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto. Leo Fall has just finished a new operetta, 'Young England'; the first performance will take place here at the West-End Theatre.

BRUSSELS.

Mozart's charming ballet, 'Les Petits Riens,' performed at Paris in 1778, has been revived at the Théâtre de la Monnaie.—'Elektra' and 'Salomé' are included in the programme of the Richard Strauss Festival. They will be given under the composer's conductorship.—A very successful recital was given by the famous Lieder-singer, Madame Lula Myscz-Gmeiner.—Several cantatas, arias, choruses and instrumental works by J. S. Bach were given at the Bach Concert.—At the third Popular Concert a fine performance of Sibelius's interesting E minor Symphony was given under Schneevoigt's baton.—Handel's 'Israel in Egypt' was performed at the Royal Conservatoire.

COLOGNE.

Korngold's 'Sinfonietta' and Bolko von Hochberg's Pianoforte concerto in C minor, with W. Lütsch as soloist, were the novelties at the sixth Gürzenich-Konzert. A first concert-performance of Enrico Bossi's new opera 'Johanna d'Arc,' under the great Italian composer's conductorship, has been given here. The work was received with great enthusiasm.

LEIPSIK.

Schönberg's 'Kammer-symphonie' has been produced here under Nikisch at the Gewandhaus. Opinions regarding the work are very much divided.

LUCERNE.

Gabriel Pierné's 'The Children's Crusade' has been given here for the first time in Switzerland. Three performances have taken place under the direction of Robert Denzler. The work created a profound impression. The district choir Festival will be held on June 20 and 21 next.

MOSCOW.

Two concerts devoted to works by Rachmaninov have taken place. The great national composer was heard as soloist in his second and third Pianoforte concertos, the former at the Philharmonic, and the latter at the Kussewitzki concerts. He also conducted the fourth Philharmonic concert (with Casals as soloist).—Elgar's 'Falstaff' was successfully performed at the fourth concert of the Société Impériale de Musique. At other concerts works by Debussy (conducted by the composer), Reger, Busoni, Stravinski, Wassilenko, Hugo Wolf, Brahms, and Grieg were performed.—The Symphony Orchestra gave three concerts devoted to works (instrumental and vocal) by J. S. Bach.—A Handel evening was given by the Moskauer Musikverein.

MUNICH.

The eight choruses for female voices by Schumann, arranged in connected form and provided with an orchestral accompaniment by Hans Pfitzner, have been performed here with considerable success.

NICE.

Verdi's opera 'Jérusalem' has been successfully revived under M. Flon.—César Franck's Symphony in D minor, D'Indy's 'Symphonie Céléstine,' and Berlioz's 'Roméo' were the features of the first grand 'Concert classique,' given at the Opéra. The second concert of the same series was entirely devoted to works by Saint-Saëns. The second Symphony, 'La jeunesse d'Hercule' and the ballet from 'Henry VIII.' were included in the programme.

PARMA.

An interesting concert of works by Arcangelo Corelli was given recently. The programme included the famous eighth Concerto Grosso, for two violins and violoncello with string orchestra and harmonium, and several Sonatas.

ST. PETERSBURG.

Leopold von Auer created quite a sensation by his magnificent interpretation of Beethoven's Violin concerto at the Beethoven evening given by the Société Impériale de Musique. Stravinsky's Ballet-fragment 'Petruschka,' Glazounov's seventh Symphony, Liszt's 'Les Preludes' and Piano-forte concerto in A (with Rislér as soloist) were excellently performed at the fifth Kussewitzki concert.—Strauss's 'Don Quixote' and Glazounov's interesting fifth Symphony were performed to perfection under Mengelberg's baton. Rachmaninov's splendid new choral work 'Glocken,' the chief feature of the fourth Siloti concert, gained a remarkable success under the composer's conductorship. At the fifth concert of the same institution Glazounov gave a brilliant interpretation of his eighth Symphony. A splendid performance of Strauss's 'Also sprach Zarathustra' was given under the distinguished conductorship of Mr. Albert Coates. The programme of the concert devoted to works by J. S. Bach, given by the choir and soloists of the Imperial Court Opera (under Siloti), comprised the 'Trauerode,' the 'Magnificat,' and the Violin concerto in E flat, interpreted by Albert Spalding.—The song-recital of compositions by Gerhard von Kuessler, given by A. Boruttau, proved very attractive. The composer (at the piano-forte) and the performer were well received. The ballet music to 'Orpheus,' a 'Mimodrame-lyrique' by Roger-Ducasse, formed the principal feature of the seventh Siloti concert.

VIENNA.

At the second Philharmonic concert under Weingartner a first hearing of the Concerto Grosso for two violins, piano-forte and orchestra, composed by Joan Manen, was given. The soloists were the composer, Herr Prill, and Joachim Nin at the piano-forte. The very interesting work was brilliantly played and obtained an undoubted success.—Dr. Ethel Smyth's new String quartet in E minor was accorded an enthusiastic reception on the occasion of its production at a concert organized by 'Der Merker.'—The second of the two evenings devoted to works by Delius and Cyril Scott given by the Wiener Tonkünstlerverein, included a cycle of songs by Delius (sung by Frau Gutheil-Schoder), and a Piano-forte sonata and a Pastorale for flute and piano-forte by Cyril Scott. The works were much appreciated.

WARSAW.

Gabriel Fauré's music to 'Pelléas and Mélisande,' E. Boche's 'Taormina,' and Strauss's 'Festliches Praeludium' were given a first hearing under Birnbaum's baton. The second subscription concert comprised works by the famous national composer, Moniusko. At other concerts recently given, the 'Jena' Symphony and symphonic works by Karłowicz, Opieski, and Rozycki were performed.

Miscellaneous.

We are reminded by Mrs. Livingstone, a daughter of the late Charles Salaman, that March 3 is the centenary of the birth of her father, who was a well-known and respected London musician. He died on June 3, 1901. A full account of his career and a portrait are given in the Musical Times for August, 1901.

Considerable success attended the dramatic performance of Henry Edward Hobson's 'Golden Legend' by the Philadelphia Operatic Society on January 29. Scenery, costume, and action were employed, under the stage-management of Mr. Grant. M. Wassili Leps conducted.

Mr. W. W. Starmer lectured on 'Chimes and chime tunes' before a meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at the Regent Street Polytechnic on February 14.

Mr. Frederick Corder has given three lectures at the Royal Institution on 'Neglected composers: Spohr, Raff, and Joachim.'

Madame Liza Lehmann and Mr. Gordon Cleather have been appointed professors of singing at the Guildhall School of Music.

Mr. C. E. Allsopp has been appointed music-master at Dollar Academy, Dollar, Scotland.

Answers to Correspondents.

F. G.—Rag-time was copied by the Americans from the music of their negroes. The name is probably in origin a modern colloquialism, although it has been suggested that its derivation is from the Indian word Raga-music, which denotes syncopation.

LIBER.—There is not, so far as we know, a published organ arrangement of Sullivan's 'Tempest' music.

A PRACTICAL GUIDE TO THE THEORY OF MUSIC

CONTAINING

NUMEROUS TEST-QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS.

BY

JULIA A. O'NEILL

(Composer of "EXERCISES FOR THE WEAKER FINGERS" (Progressive Studies, Edited by FRANKLIN TAYLOR, Book 53) and of "MELODIOUS TECHNIQUE").

Price One Shilling. Paper Boards, 1s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

It is in its clear statement of facts, both in writing and by the use of simple diagrams, that Miss Julia O'Neill's book excels.

THE MORNING POST.

Her manner of putting down the facts is concise and clear. An immense amount of ground is covered in logical sequence, and the book is one of the most helpful publications as yet made. It is satisfactory to note that ear-cultivation is touched upon.

MUSICAL OPINION.

It is really surprising the amount of useful matter that Julia A. O'Neill has managed to compress within the covers of her primer, "A Practical Guide to the Theory of Music." Teachers who wish to keep abreast of the times in an educational sense will find this well-written guide calculated to help them to a knowledge of the latest and most accepted method of elementary theoretical instruction. We are pleased to note that the all-important subject of ear-culture has not been neglected in the present primer.

THE LADY.

Is a thoroughly praiseworthy attempt to present the cardinal facts of musical theory in a plain and straightforward manner to the beginner. Wholly admirable is the way the gradual formation of our present-day clefs is explained.

THE BARD OF AVON

A SHAKESPEAREAN SUITE.
 FOR SOLO VOICES AND CHORUS.
 With Orchestral Accompaniment by JULIUS HARRISON.

Vocal Score, Paper, 2s.; Boards, 2s. 6d.; Cloth, gilt, 3s. 6d.

Each copy of the First Edition contains as a Frontispiece a Portrait of the late Composer, from the painting by J. J. Alsop, R.B.A.

Birmingham Daily Gazette.—"The libretto largely consists of a sequence of well-known songs and famous and familiar passages from the dramas, set for chorus and orchestra, with tenor and soprano solos, the whole in the composer's most spontaneous manner. Indeed, the charm of the movements may be said to equal the best of his previous work, if not to surpass it. . . . Deserves a popularity equal to that which for more than thirty years has been the lot of the composer's cantata, 'The Holy City,' known to, and performed by, almost every English-speaking body of chorists on the planet."

Birmingham Daily Mail.—"The composition bears all the characteristics of the composer's graceful style, simplicity of form, and melodic charm. — A captivating theme in valse rhythm, and a charming episode, an Allegretto tranquillo . . . give tone variety to the overture. The first chorus, 'Where thou, bright Avon,' is a barcarole-like concerted piece of pastoral tendency, contrapuntally treated in effective manner. — Of much lyrical charm is the chorus, 'Where should this music be?' — 'O mistress mine' . . . a sparkling song. — A madrigal, 'It was a lover and his lass' . . . is a fine example of part-writing, one of the most captivating numbers of the whole suite. — 'Blow, blow, thou winter wind' . . . conceived in dramatic manner. — 'Ye spotted snakes,' . . . varied in moods and fanciful expression. — The final number is the chorus, 'The cloud-capt towers,' characterized by sonority and power."

PASSION SERVICE

(24th Thousand.)

Vocal Score, Paper, 2s. 6d.; Boards, 3s.; Cloth, 4s.; Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.

The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out so as to form a series of six distinct "scenes." THE ORGAN

BY

WALTER G. ALCOCK,

Mus. Doc. Dunelm., A.R.C.M., F.R.C.O.

Organist and Composer to His Majesty's Chapels Royal and Assistant-Organist of Westminster Abbey.

Published as a Net Book.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS NET.

THE ATHENÆUM.

A fine work . . . and is admirable at all points.

YORKSHIRE POST.

The name of Dr. Walter G. Alcock is in itself a sufficient guarantee of the sound teaching of organ-playing, and his book, "The Organ," more than sustains his reputation. . . . There are many useful exercises on various technical points, and some short original pieces which serve as further illustrations of the author's teaching. It is very clearly printed on good, stout paper, and from every point of view is a desirable book.

THE SCOTSMAN.

The work is a distinctly useful addition to books of musical instruction.

THE BRISTOL TIMES AND MIRROR.

Although many books of instruction about the organ have been published, the latest is among the best. Its merits are sundry. . . . If the book be thoroughly mastered no other one is needed for the purpose of tuition, for it is the key to everything that has been written for the king of instruments. The print is exceedingly clear, and the book itself neat and attractive.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS.

This is not an "instruction" book in the ordinary use of the term, for its scope is too wide, and the information given is so largely the result of personal experiment and experience that those who have already advanced in the art of organ playing will find many hints and suggestions which will prove of practical service. The book is admirably divided into sections dealing with the elements of organ art; and a very important chapter is that on hymn-playing.

THE SUNDAY TIMES.

Every young organ student will find himself greatly helped by "The Organ," a new manual of the instrument by Dr. Alcock.

THE BOOKSELLER.

Dr. Alcock has produced a very helpful and useful book which the ambitious player will do well to study with great care and attention; he who follows the directions here given will undoubtedly find his work as an organist very materially assisted.

CHURCH FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

Written by a master of his subject, "The Organ" makes an immediate appeal to organists of all descriptions, for the matter contained in the book embraces all that is necessary from simple pedal exercises—called by some "first steps"—up to pieces requiring all the resources of modern organ technique.

CHORAL TECHNIQUE & INTERPRETATION

BY

HENRY COWARD.

MUS. DOC. OXON.

PRESS NOTICES.

"The title and the author's name together will be sufficient to secure for this book a wide circle of musical readers. No one has done more than Dr. Henry Coward to further the remarkable advance in choral technique which has been so efficient in this country in recent years. Dr. Coward has spent his life in perfecting a system of choral training which he has exemplified in his Sheffield Choir, and carried triumphantly over the English-speaking world and even further. In this book he tells precisely what this system is and so fortifies precept with example, illustrating his points with quotations from musical masterpieces, that it places a valuable manual of instruction in the hands of every choir-master. It has been his aim to give 'such advice and instruction that no single problem connected with choral singing shall remain unsolved.' Those who know his work will not need to be assured that the book is eminently practical, but it may be added that it is written in the plain and forthright style which is characteristic of the author."—The Times, January 15, 1914.

"What that method is, and how it may be applied to choral singing, is told unreservedly and lucidly in Dr. Coward's book 'Choral technique and interpretation.' This book is something more than an exhaustive and, to choral conductors, an invaluable text-book of what may be conveniently described as 'choralism.' It is an unconscious autobiography of one of the most notable figures in the world of music. Henry Coward has written himself into these pages. We can visualise the man as he stands before a chorus, sure of himself, blunt and forceful, labouring at an idea, and gradually crystallising it into an apt phrase or a still more felicitous quotation or anecdote; persistent, insistent, prepared to bully or wheedle a choir into submission, and finally 'getting there' by sheer force of his genial, dogged, characterful personality. He has put into the book, freely and fully, all he knows. He lays out for the benefit of inexperience all the harvest of thirty years of labour, study, and a degree of minute specialisation which in choral music has no parallel among even the great choir-trainers who preceded or are contemporary with him."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph, December 26, 1913.

"Dr. Coward's great work, the publication of which has been eagerly anticipated by conductors, voice-trainers, and chorists generally, is hot from the press. In it the father of British choralism—that is to say choralism with art in it—gives away all his secrets. Aspiring organists and choir-masters have long sat at his feet eager to learn the secret of the marvellous power that the Sheffield doctor has wielded over the thousands of chorists with whom he has come in contact. Some of them by assiduous attention have assimilated some of the methods of the master; but it has been realised that behind the whole there is the personality of the man, his grit, his grip, his intense earnestness, and his determination to achieve success, however exacting the task before him."—Sheffield Independent, December 20, 1913.

"Dr. Henry Coward is by reputation possibly the most successful master of choral training in England. He has figured at the Festivals, and enjoys the credit of having developed choral singing to a very high level at Sheffield, Huddersfield, Leeds, and Newcastle. In his book on 'Choral Technique and Interpretation' he gives away all the tricks of his trade."—The Scotsman, January 8, 1914.

"Dr. Henry Coward, conductor of the famous Sheffield Choir, has made a very valuable contribution to the series of handbooks for musicians (edited by Mr. Ernest Newman) by producing a somewhat unique volume dealing with choral technique and interpretation. It is unique in this sense that it is quite modern, and embodies the actual experience of the author who has had experience which falls to the lot of few conductors. The book should be possessed by all choir trainers."—The Bristol Times and Mirror, January 15, 1914.

"The author is one of the most brilliant examples of a man climbing from unpropitious surroundings to a high artistic plane, and it is always interesting to learn the factors that have contributed to such marked advancement. For many years past Dr. Coward held the first place as a conductor of choral societies, and although of late years several other musicians have shown themselves equally capable of securing fine performances, he must always be regarded as laying the foundation of what may be termed the new choral technique. Dr. Coward therefore writes with the authority of one who has verified the truth of his theories and proved the correctness of his methods by practical results of the most convincing kind. Choir trainers may not always agree with Dr. Coward's views of interpretation, and, truth to tell, they are more technical than æsthetic, but it is not too much to say that in this book will be found all the chief principles of the impressive delivery of choral music. Moreover, the book is written with a directness and clearness of expression which reminds one of the learned professor's answer to the young lady who expressed her enjoyment of his recent lecture: 'I am so glad you were able to follow me. I took great care that what I said should be understood by the meanest intelligence.'"—The Referee, January 11, 1914.

"There can be no doubt that few living musicians are better entitled to discourse on the subject of choral singing than Dr. Coward, whose book on 'Choral technique and interpretation' is certain to be widely read, and its precepts carefully considered. As a conductor his interpretations may not always commend themselves to one's judgment, but as a choir-trainer it is no exaggeration to assert that his labours have marked a new era in chorus-singing. For this reason his clear exposition of the methods by which he has achieved his aims has an obvious value, and his book is the more readable because of the lively style and genial enthusiasm that characterise it. His description of his conduct of a rehearsal is full of suggestive points by which every choir-trainer may profit, whether he employ them with literal exactitude or not."—Yorkshire Post, January 14, 1914.

TECHNIQUE

EXPRESSION

IN

PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

THE FINEST ENGLISH MAKE CHAPPELL PIANOS CANNOT BE EXCELLED

FOR THEIR EXQUISITE TONE, RESPONSIVE TOUCH, REMARKABLE SINGING QUALITY, AND LASTING DURABILITY.

BACKHAUS says: "I cannot speak too highly of the brilliant and sympathetic tone and responsive touch. You need fear no rival."

PROFESSOR ERNST VON DOHNÁNYI says: "It gives me great pleasure to state that in the qualities of tone and touch the Chappell Piano ranks first in Pianofortes of the highest grade."

DR. RICHARD STRAUSS says: "I consider the tone of a remarkably sweet and sympathetic quality and of unusual sustaining power, the touch very responsive and light. Having always been used to pianos of German make, it was a great and agreeable surprise to me to find such a perfect instrument of British manufacture."

SELECTED PIANOFORTE STUDIES

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

In Two Sets (Eight Books),
PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE EACH BOOK.

The present collection of Studies is designed to provide teachers with a short course of Pianoforte Technique adapted to the needs of the average pupil, the intention being to spare the teacher the labour of choosing a sufficiently varied selection from the large mass of material existing, and at the same time to ensure that the different departments of technique shall be undertaken in the order which experience has proved to be the most beneficial.

The Studies are grouped in two Sets, and are so arranged that the different Books in which they are contained may be taken in consecutive order, but pupils who are already further advanced than the elementary stage represented by Set I. may commence at once with Set II., which will be found to be complete in itself, and to illustrate all the essential elements of technique.

When additional studies are desired, or studies on certain subjects which are not touched upon in this series, the larger collection, published under the title of "Progressive Studies" (from which the present examples have been selected), is of course available.

WASTED, AND WORSE,

re the thousands of hours spent daily over futile "practice" of scales, &c., supposed to make good pianists, but usually failing to do so. Worse than wasted, because a good touch is often ruined in the process.

Avoid all these ills by taking the Course of Postal Lessons in the well-known MACDONALD SMITH SYSTEM, enabling you to play better than ever before, without drudgery. Special Course also for mere beginners.

Write for "Light on Pianoforte Playing," free by post.

POOR MARKS FOR SIGHT - PLAYING.

The usual result in all Pianoforte examinations is that the student gets good marks for every other branch of pianoforte tuition and poor marks for sight-playing. This inability to play at sight continues after student days, and deprives the pianist of the pleasure he would otherwise derive from his pianoforte playing.

Years of practising by ordinary methods for many hours daily may give a limited proficiency. The Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing, however, will give a much greater proficiency after three months of about fifteen minutes' daily practising.

Hundreds of students and amateur and professional pianists have taken the Ehremayer Course of Lessons with the utmost possible success. Lessons are given by correspondence, and are as efficiently given by that means as personal lessons. The course of lessons in no way interferes with present studies.

It is worth the while of every pianist to write for the Booklet describing the System. A post-card addressed to L. M. EHREMYER, 27, Chancery Lane, London, W.C., is all that is required.

A UNIQUE OPPORTUNITY

TO ACQUIRE A PROSPEROUS UNENCUMBERED

BAND INSTRUMENT OUTFITTING AND REPAIR BUSINESS.

ESTABLISHED in 1898, the Proprietor has acquired a competency, and his only reason for disposing is his wish to retire from business. The profits are excellent, and fullest investigation by a chartered accountant is courted. The stock is well assorted, large, and thoroughly up-to-date. A man of energy and ability can easily clear £1,500 per annum from the business. The business practically controls all the repair work in New Zealand. The workshop is perfectly appointed, the shop has an excellent stand in a good street in the Capital of New Zealand, and conducts a wide business all over New Zealand and further afield.

Price, £6,000—terms will be considered. First-class exclusive agencies.

Write in first instance to "Dominion," c/o Steele's Advertising Service, Norfolk House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C., who will forward letters to Principal in New Zealand.

THE TIMES.

It is in its clear statement of facts, both in writing and by the use of simple diagrams, that Miss Julia O'Neill's book excels.

THE MORNING POST.

Her manner of putting down the facts is concise and clear. An immense amount of ground is covered in logical sequence, and the book is one of the most helpful publications as yet made. It is satisfactory to note that ear-cultivation is touched upon.

MUSICAL OPINION.

It is really surprising the amount of useful matter that Julia A. O'Neill has managed to compress within the covers of her primer, "A Practical Guide to the Theory of Music." Teachers who wish to keep abreast of the times in an educational sense will find this well-written guide calculated to help them to a knowledge of the latest and most accepted method of elementary theoretical instruction. We are pleased to note that the all-important subject of ear-culture has not been neglected in the present primer.

THE LADY.

Is a thoroughly praiseworthy attempt to present the cardinal facts of musical theory in a plain and straightforward manner to the beginner. Wholly admirable is the way the gradual formation of our present-day clefs is explained.

ALBERT HENRY COATES.

The path to fame is often devious, and it has rarely been more so than with the subject of this sketch. It would be too much to say that an English conductor must first win fame abroad before he can secure recognition in this country, because there are notable instances to prove that this is not true. But there can be no doubt that a Continental reputation is a valuable asset in this country. The really remarkable fact in the present case is that a young Englishman has been so generously recognised and honoured in one of the most important operatic centres in the world. This acceptance and appreciation of a foreign artist does very great credit to the breadth of view of the directors of the St. Petersburg Opera House; and our own Royal Opera Syndicate is entitled to share some of this credit, because whatever their proclivities for foreign artists—and it must be remembered that they are bound to endeavour to provide Covent Garden with the best the world affords—they have done much to encourage native executive talent.

Albert Henry Coates was born at St. Petersburg on Good Friday, April 23, 1882. His father, an Englishman, who was born at Bridlington Quay, Yorkshire, went to St. Petersburg with his parents when he was a lad, and eventually settled there in business. He married a Russian lady who had some English connections. Albert was the youngest of seven sons. Coates père had no special musical leanings, but there was musical taste if not executive skill on the mother's side. The social life of the family was not definitely musical, and therefore did not provide a specially encouraging environment, but it was observed that the youthful Albert displayed decided faculty for the Art. When he was twelve years of age he was sent to a school at Buckhurst Hill, in Essex, in order that he might have an English education. This pleasant and at that time rural suburb of London, which is situated on the borders of Epping Forest, was chosen because of its healthy surroundings, and in view of the fact that Coates at this period was not robust, a statement that, fortunately, cannot be made of the powerful and fearsome athlete of to-day. He remained at this school about a year, and whilst there came under the influence of Mr. Henry Riding, who was the music-master of the establishment, and who is still a well-known professor in the neighbourhood. Mr. Riding's capability and the share he had in shaping his young pupil's budding faculty are to-day gratefully acknowledged. Coates's impulse to composition at this period found vent during his holidays, which were spent at St. Petersburg. His wife tells us that she has in her possession two trios and a quartet which he composed on these occasions between the thirteenth and fifteenth years of his age. Glazounov, to whom Mrs. Coates showed the compositions, said that they exhibited gifts and a ripeness exceptional in one so young.

Coates's next move was to a private school at Liverpool. Here one of his brothers was a church organist, and under him Albert studied organ-playing, harmony, and composition. This devoted brother, who died in 1897 at the age of twenty, had visions as to Albert's musical potentialities derived from his experience of the youth's capacity, and, as will be seen later, this insight ultimately became the compelling force that determined Albert to seek a musical career. But at this period there were no such thoughts. After his brother's lamented death, Albert made a brief visit to his parents at St. Petersburg and then returned to Liverpool in order to enter the University. Science in the form of electricity and chemistry now absorbed his attention. These studies brought him into intercourse with Dr. (now Sir) Oliver Lodge, to whom another of Albert's brothers was an assistant. He remained in these surroundings on and off for four years. Meantime, music had been almost abandoned, for one reason because it was too sadly associated with the death of the brother referred to above. But, however, as the following incident shows, there were still pinings to record the musical thoughts that would bubble up. During a short period spent at St. Petersburg, his father, who was dubious as to the advantages offered by the music profession, placed the youth in his office and endeavoured to instil into him the mysteries of book-keeping. But it was soon found that young Coates's entries were so sadly in arrear—the books being kept on the no-entry system—that the anxious parent wondered how his son could accomplish so little in so much time. One day he, unobserved, saw the 'book-keeper' draw from his desk a large sheet of music-paper on which he worked assiduously. It was the full score of the first movement of a symphony he was orchestrating! This discovery gave the father food for reflection, and it was no doubt a factor in the decision that was ultimately taken.

Arrived at the age of twenty, Coates again visited St. Petersburg in order to discuss with his family his future course, and to learn for the first time that his late brother in his will had expressed an earnest desire that when Albert had reached the twentieth year of his age he would see fit to give himself wholly to the musical art. This desire, so pathetically revealed, was the turning-point in the young man's career. It was regarded as a solemn injunction that must be obeyed, and the result was that not very long afterwards Coates was entered as a student in the Leipsic Conservatoire. Before quitting St. Petersburg he had become acquainted with Rimsky-Korsakov, and from him had taken some lessons in composition from which he derived much enlightenment.

At Leipsic Conservatoire Coates studied the violoncello under Julius Klengel, and the pianoforte under Robert Teichmüller. Of both professors he speaks in the highest terms, and he feels that he owes much to their stimulating ability. He also took private lessons in instrumentation from Prof. Hofmann, who was not on the staff of the Conservatoire. Although as a violoncello student Coates made considerable progress, and played in the Gewandhaus Orchestra, he felt that the instrument did not afford sufficient scope for the gratification of his musical cravings, and he therefore resolved to abandon the study and to specialise on the pianoforte. At this period Arthur Nikisch became director of the Conservatoire and the Opera House, and he made a feature of teaching the art of conducting. In this way Coates came under Nikisch's powerful influence, and soon found his métier. In some academic circles there is incredulity as to the utility of attempting to teach conducting as a set subject, because it is believed to be an art that can be acquired only by those to the manner born. But even so, how are the born conductors to be discovered? Coates might never have found himself but for this Conservatoire class. After his 'Prüfung' (a sort of final demonstration of capacity), and with the design of enlarging his experience, Coates paid weekly visits to Berlin, and there took pianoforte lessons from Teresa Carreño. This went on for about a year. Meantime, Nikisch appointed him his opera house répétiteur, so he was now fairly started on an operatic career. During this period Nikisch was unexpectedly summoned to Berlin to conduct an orchestral concert, and both the other opera conductors being ill, Coates was as suddenly called upon to conduct 'Tales of Hoffman.' This début was eminently successful, and fixed the young conductor's reputation, and led (in 1906) to his engagement, on Nikisch's recommendation, as first conductor at the Elberfeld Opera House. This appointment to a premier position fixed his grade, for never since has he been asked to accept a less important position. Elberfeld was a fertile school for Coates. Here he conducted about forty operas, including all the important Wagner works (except, of course, 'Parsifal,' which, however, he conducted in concert form), Strauss's 'Salome' and 'Feuersnot,' and the classical operas of Weber, Beethoven, Mozart, &c. He remained at Elberfeld two years, and then, in 1910, went to Dresden to share the chief conductorship with Von Schuch. On July 23 of this year he married Miss Madelon Holland, a daughter of Mr. Alfred R. Holland. The musical atmosphere at Dresden had a great formative influence over Coates, and enlarged his artistic outlook and gave him strength and confidence. Whilst at Dresden he received an invitation from St. Petersburg, which he deemed it advisable not to accept, at least at once, as he designed first to acquire greater experience in a more independent position than Dresden at this time could give him. He therefore accepted another offer of a first conductorship at the Mannheim Opera House, where he had as a colleague Herr Bodansky, the conductor of this season's 'Parsifal' performances at Covent Garden. Coates remained in this position for one whole season, and during this period was invited to conduct 'Siegfried' at a Gastspiel at St. Petersburg. Here again his success was conspicuous, and he had the honour of being engaged as a first conductor at the Opera House for a period of five years, ending 1915. This contract he has recently renewed for another five years from that date.

The season at St. Petersburg lasts from September 1 to the beginning of April. There are seven conductors, with one of whom Coates shares the principal position. His esteemed colleague is Napravnik, a veteran whose fiftieth year of conducting at the Opera was duly celebrated in September last year. The repertoire is of course a comprehensive one, and it has the unique advantage of including not only the well-known operas of Wagner, and others generally in vogue, but also the finest outpourings of Russian composers, some of which so greatly excited operatic circles in London last year, and by the enterprise of Sir Joseph Beecham are to be heard again this season.

The famous Russian Ballet does not come under Mr. Coates's sway, except so far as ballet is incidental in the operas he directs. Next season (1914-15), however, he will direct the first production of a 'Mimodrame-lyrique en trois actes,' based upon the Orpheus and Eurydice story, by the French composer Roger-Ducasse. This novel work has a chorus and four vocal soli parts, besides the artists of the ballet.*

Mr. Coates will also conduct another new ballet by the talented Russian composer, Anatole Liadov, and there will be included in next season's repertoire a new opera, 'Metell' (The Storm), by Alexander Tanéïev, and 'Rosenkavalier' will be performed for the first time at St. Petersburg. Then Mr. Coates's own new opera will be produced in February, 1915. We are not at liberty at present to give a full account of this work, but we may say that the title is 'Assurbanipal, King of Assyria,' and that harmonic rather than leit motif suggestion is the basis of its musical psychology.

Mr. Coates has yet to win his spurs in this country as a symphony conductor. But we shall know more of his capacity in this special field after he fulfils the engagement he has made to conduct a Liverpool Philharmonic Concert next February and a London Philharmonic Concert about the same time.

Mr. Coates returned to Russia on March 8 to resume his duties at the Opera, but it is satisfactory to know that his recent triumphant success at Covent Garden has led the Royal Opera Syndicate to engage him for this year's summer season, the chief burden of which he will share with Herr Nikisch.

* An account of the new work appeared in The Times on February 24.

Mr. Coates desires us to state that he deeply appreciates the very generous reception he has experienced from the English Press and the public.

The following are among the numerous Press criticisms on Mr. Coates's conducting that have appeared :

'DIE MEISTERSINGER.'

The orchestral portion was given with remarkable significance under the direction of Mr. Albert Coates, who again proved himself a masterly conductor.—Yorkshire Post.

The main credit of the performance, however, belongs to the conductor, Mr. Albert Coates. For some mysterious reason he let the orchestra get momentarily out of hand in the Overture. But subsequently he allowed no slipshod work either on or off the stage. Every detail of the score was made clear to those who would but listen, and yet the utmost sympathy was shown for the singers. In a word, Mr. Coates proved himself a great conductor, and that because he knew his score thoroughly and set out to reveal its beauties rather than to make points that should glorify himself.—Sunday Times.

The distinction of the share taken by Mr. Albert Coates has already been recorded. Of the score—that wonderful effort, a masterpiece of grace, charm, and humour by the composer of 'The Ring' and 'Parsifal'—his reading was that of a musician. More, doubtless, he will convey, particularly with regard to the Overture, on a future occasion. But he suppressed the 'orchestral' features of the score in favour of the poetic, and won the thanks of all who realise that the first principle of 'Die Meistersinger' is poetic expression. The immense audience received the performance with the utmost enthusiasm. It is clear that the work must not be passed over in future representations of German opera by the Syndicate.—Morning Post.

The resilient life of the Prelude as it was played under Mr. Coates's direction seemed to establish at once a strong chord of sympathy between the stage and the auditorium. Its existence was beyond doubt one of the main causes of the fact that the performance gathered force all the way along till it reached its inevitable climax at the moment when Eva transferred the laurels from the head of Walther to the head of Sachs. . . . But perhaps the chief honours should go to Mr. Albert Coates, with whom the ensemble rested. For it was a general rather than an individual excellence which made the evening memorable.—The Times.

Mr. Albert Coates, who conducted, again covered himself with glory. He had soloists, chorus, and orchestra well under control, and his reading was all but perfect in clarity and balance. The house recognised readily what they owed to his efforts, and gave him a very warm reception at the close of each Act.—Globe.

It is rare, indeed, to hear one of such uniform excellence ; no one part stood out above the rest, and in consequence there was a unanimity of expression which a work like 'Die Meistersinger' so especially needs. This being so, it seemed hardly to matter that the quality of high distinction was not forthcoming ; we had, none the less, an invigorating interpretation, entirely owing to the sympathetic spirit displayed by all concerned. Perhaps the leading factor in ensuring this was the conducting of Mr. Albert Coates. Except for now and again a suggestion that the tempi were a trifle on the slow side, his rhythmic control and his evident feeling for continuity were just what were wanted to preserve the outstanding characteristic of this monumental score, the tireless and unflagging spirit of its melodic flow. The hearer was never let down by an excessive tendency to make points, or by an overdue allowance of ritenuto for the sake of the singers.—Pall Mall Gazette.

. . . . While at curtain-fall their [the audience's] expression took the form of wild calls for all concerned in the performance, from Mr. Albert Coates, who conducted with fine authority, and whom the real enthusiasts upstairs seem clearly to have taken to their heart, down to the least important of the many characters whose names stand in the bill. . . . If this is the case, that neither of these artists had rehearsed with the orchestra for this particular performance, then the success of the performance reflects even more than the usual amount of credit upon the conductor, for the very obvious reason that he must have been unusually alert in order to be ready for any particular individual note that might have differed from the general interpretation. An example is forthcoming in the singing by Mr. Hutt of the Preislied, where his rubato might conceivably have led to a disaster, however mild, had not the conductor been one of exceptional presence of mind.

. . . . The orchestra played superbly, and if there were some ragged edges in the playing of the first Prelude, the amplex amends were made subsequently by their magnificent performance of the Prelude to the third Act. Mr. Coates, as we have said, was the conductor, and exhibited a complete mastery over the score.—Daily Telegraph.

Mr. Albert Coates's reading of the music never failed to be interesting and suggestive, even in places where one was not in entire agreement with his views. There was, for instance, a good deal of hurrying at the end of the first Act, so that the words could hardly be spoken fast enough ; and in the scene between Sachs and Walther at the beginning of the third Act a good deal of the music was made to sound a little too much like dance music, and the close of the second Act was almost too delicate. Still, everything bore the impress of a conductor who knew exactly what he wanted and how to procure it, and the qualities of life, imagination, and humour which go to make up the wonderful total which is 'Die Meistersinger' were all there and deftly blended.—Daily Chronicle.

'PROMETHEUS': THE POEM OF FIRE.

BY ROSA NEWMARCH.

The publication in the Musical Times of the subjoined analysis* of Scriabin's 'Prometheus, the Symphony of Fire,' transfers it from a concert audience to a wider circle of readers, many of whom will not have had the advantage of hearing the work. At the same time they will be bound to form some preconceived notion of the Symphony on the basis of my notes, and may not unnaturally question my authority to issue so detailed an account of it. This foreword is written partly in anticipation of such doubts, and partly in reply to one or two criticisms already passed upon the analysis.

I have been told that the notes attempt to explain too much, and tend to hamper the hearer's clear and independent judgment of the work as music. This criticism emanates as usual from those who think that a musical work should be left to be its own explanation. This is the type of critic who, Canute-like, sits solemnly and vainly rebuking the oncoming tide of music 'which means something.' Being compelled to acknowledge that programme-music has come to stay, he often takes up the curiously illogical attitude that when a composition purports to illustrate a concrete programme it is permissible to give some suggestions of its intention ; he would allow the writer of analytical notes, like the players in 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' to say, 'this figures moonshine, or a wall, or a nightingale, or the dislocation of the spinal vertebrae'—as the case may be ; but, in dealing with the psychological programme, suggested explanation seems to him a slight to his own powers of intuition. If a musical work aspires to deal with ideas more subtle and spiritualised than the ordinary emotions of humanity,—grief, joy, passion—it should be left to take care of itself. At the bottom of these objections lies the prejudiced view that the less people are encouraged to look for philosophy or any kind of ideology in music the better. With these musical obscurantists argument is of no use. We can only point to Wagner's 'Parsifal,' Strauss's 'Thus spake Zarathustra,' and Scriabin's later Symphonies as vital proofs that genius will never be trounced into relinquishing its right to attempt the expression of philosophical or theological ideas in musical terms.

Theosophists, on the other hand, will probably find in the attempt of an uninitiated person to explain the basis of Scriabin's work, that the Promethean myth has been somewhat shorn of its fullest esoteric significance. This is a criticism in which I myself fully concur. An article upon Scriabin's 'Prometheus' by a theosophist who is also a musician, would now be of great value and interest. At the same time, I must plead on my own behalf, that any elucidation which would bring the complex programme of 'The Symphony of Fire' within reach of a large mixed and unprepared audience, must necessarily involve a certain limitation of its symbolism. So much for those who think I have said too much, and for those who, with greater justice, feel I have said too little. To a different category belongs a certain number of people who probably think that the programme of 'Prometheus' is an invention of my own imagination. Time has inured me to the mild attacks upon my veracity, generally starting, 'If we may believe the writer of the analytical notes,' &c., or, 'The writer responsible for the programme asks us to credit the statement, &c.,' or with some similar phrases. I can only assure these doubting spirits that analytical notes are seldom written out of complete ignorance or ingenious fancy. We have to work our way industriously into the nut before we can begin to tell the world anything about its flavour. The difference between the programme analyst and 'the boring worm' is that the latter is not expected to waste energy in piercing the obviously empty shell. The programmer must always go through this ceremony, even when he soon ceases to be a 'boring worm' and becomes a bored one. The analytical note of the present day demands assiduous study of the score, some intuitive faculty, above all, perfect good faith. In the case of a work by a living composer he can, and often does, help the analyst by suggestions of his own. But the writer of programmes must not under any circumstances shield himself behind the authority of the composer. He should take full responsibility for what he writes, and the composer's share in the analysis of his works should never be revealed to the public except at his expressed wish.

In the case of 'Prometheus' my notes are founded partly on my own deductions from the score and partly from articles on Scriabin written (in Russian) by L. Sabaneiev. The composer himself has taken no part in the preparation of these notes, but the fact that he consented to their being reprinted in toto for the concert of the Queen's Hall Orchestra on Saturday, March 14, may be taken as an assurance that he is satisfied with them as an aid to the better understanding of his work, until the time comes when he himself will give us a more complete revelation of his musical philosophy. This he will certainly do, although he considers that the hour is not yet ripe.

Alexander Scriabine—or Scriabin, for the final 'e' is superfluous in English—was born at Moscow, December 29, 1871 (Old Style). Originally intended for a military career, he showed such marked talent for music that his parents removed him from the Cadet Corps and sent him to the Conservatoire of his native town, where he studied composition with Tchaikovsky's pupil Taneiev, and pianoforte with Safonov. Leaving the Conservatoire in 1891, he made a long concert-tour in Western Europe, and won distinction as a pianist. On his return to Russia he was appointed professor of pianoforte at the Moscow Conservatoire—a post which he relinquished in 1903 in order to devote himself more completely to composition.

Seeing that he started life as a pianist, it is not surprising that his earliest essays in composition should have been deeply influenced by Chopin. His first twenty opus numbers—Preludes, Mazurkas, Etudes, &c.—impress us not so much as the work of a clever beginner echoing the style of his favourite master, as the productions of a nature almost hypnotized for the time being by a musical affinity. Afterwards Scriabin passed under the influence of Liszt, and in a much less degree under that of Wagner. From the first two composers he assimilated almost intuitively certain harmonic peculiarities which he developed more fully and consciously in his later works.

An art founded largely on the methods of Chopin and Liszt was likely to show elements of extreme sensibility, amounting almost to neuroticism, and a tendency to the transcendental and the fantastic. Later in his career Scriabin was attracted to theosophy, and his music soon became involved with his philosophical creed. His first Symphony is a hymn of praise to Art as Religion. 'Glory be to art for ever and ever,' runs the concluding chorus of this work. The second Symphony celebrates the emancipation of the soul from its fetters—the self-expression of personality. The third Symphony, entitled 'The Divine poem,' deals with the problem of artistic creative power, which Scriabin sees as one phenomenon of the universal creative spirit: an eternal, unresting activity which can therefore never attain to a state of contented accomplishment. This Symphony is divided into three sections—'Strife,' 'Sensuous pleasures,' 'The Divine Activity.' His next important orchestral work, 'The poem of Ecstasy,' is a still further advance in musical psychology. Here we find motives of languor, of yearning for life, of will-power, of creative force, of dreams, and so on. In 'The poem of Ecstasy' Scriabin is said to have first discovered the luminous quality of certain harmonic combinations.

'Prometheus: the poem of Fire,' presses still nearer to the realisation of the composer's theosophical views. It is considered to mark the crystallization of the style which he has been building up for the last ten or fifteen years. Scriabin is peculiarly sensitive to the association of sounds and colours. Wagner, Hoffmann, and Rimsky-Korsakov all had this colour-hearing faculty in varying degrees. The composer intends that in 'Prometheus' the symphony of sounds shall be eventually accompanied by a symphony of colour-rays. To this end he has invented a tastiera per luce, or keyboard of light. Unfortunately this apparatus is not yet sufficiently perfect to be transported for practical purposes; but those who have seen it experimented with in private declare the effects to be very remarkable.

'Prometheus' is, so far, Scriabin's most advanced and mature effort to embody his particular ideology in musical terms. But he is at present occupied with a work which will entirely outstrip 'Prometheus' in this respect. Regarding art and religion as one, and desiring, like Wagner, to unite all the arts in the service—not, indeed, of the perfect Drama, but of the perfect Rite, he is now engaged upon a 'Mystery,' in which the secondary arts shall enhance the dominating arts (those subject to the will-power). Thus symphonies of music, words, and gesture will be accompanied by symphonies of colour and perfume. Such a union of the arts already exists in religious rituals; but apparently in his 'Mystery' Scriabin aims at doing away with the barriers which divide the celebrants (or executants) of the rite from those who are passively initiated (the onlookers and listeners), so that all alike shall experience the whole evolution of the creative spirit. In this way every art will be called into requisition in order to produce an ecstatic condition, affording a glimpse of the higher spiritual planes.

After this short and necessarily imperfect explanation of Scriabin's ideas, I need hardly say that the legend of Prometheus as presented in this Symphony differs very widely from the version with which we have been familiarized by Æschylus and Shelley. The Promethean myth is much older than even Hesiod, who relates it. It belongs, indeed, to the dawn of human consciousness. The interesting design from the cover of the score (reproduced in the programme) is by M. Jean Delville, the leader of the theosophist cult in Belgium, and shows us no ordinary conception of the Titan, 'rock-riveted and chained in height and cold,' with the vulture perpetually gnawing at his vitals, but one of that class of adepts symbolized at a much later date by the Greeks under the name of Prometheus. These 'Sons of the Flame of Wisdom,' who were closely allied with the purely spiritual side of man, were alone able to impart to humanity that sacred spark which expands into the blossom of human intelligence and self-consciousness.

According to the teaching of theosophy, the nascent races of mankind, not yet illuminated by the Promethean spark, were physically incomplete, possessing only the shadows of bodies; sinless, because devoid of conscious personality—in theosophical terms, 'without Karma.' From this condition they were liberated by the gift of Prometheus—the fire which awakened man's conscious creative power. But among those shadowy entities some were already more prepared to receive the spark than others. The more advanced understood the value of the gift, and used it on the higher spiritual planes; they became the Arhats, or Sages, of succeeding generations. The less highly organized turned it to gross material uses, involving suffering and evil. Thus the Promethean gift assumed a dual aspect: on the one hand it proved a boon, on the other a curse.

We have here the elements of a fairly definite and infinitely varied psychological programme: the crepuscular, invertebrate state of Karma-less humanity; the awakening of the will to create, in both its aspects; the strange moods of bliss and anguish which follow the acquisition of self-consciousness; probably also the last, fierce rebellion of the lower self preceding the final ecstasy of union, when the human mingles with the divine—with Agni, the fire which receives into itself all other sparks in the ultimate phase of development.

Scriabin's harmony is the outcome of a long search for such harmonic combinations as could best express his psychical experiences. As a result he bases his harmony to a great extent upon a six-note scale derived from a series of overtones as shown below:

The scale consists of the numbers 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14:

These notes, with their disposition in fourths, give him a considerable variety of intervals the perfect fourths E to A and A to D; the augmented fourths C to F sharp and B flat to E; and the diminished fourth F sharp to B flat. Scriabin regards the chords thus obtained as self-sufficing and consonant, because, when all the notes of the above scale are struck simultaneously, it gives the effect of a chord which 'consonates.' A harmonic combination which he uses as being peculiarly luminous is the chord of the ninth with the augmented fifth.

The design of 'Prometheus' approximates to sonata-form, but the treatment is very free. The scoring is for a large modern orchestra, including bells (campanelli and campani), celesta, harp, and organ. There is an important part for the pianoforte, said to personify the Microcosm man in contrast to the Macrocosm of the Cosmic Idea, represented by the orchestra. There is a choir ad libitum which lends some additional colour to the score; but it only enters—as do the bells—at the culmination of an ecstatic climax.

'Prometheus' opens Lento, in an atmosphere described as nebulous (brumeux), with a characteristic 'mystical' chord—the ninth with the augmented fifth.* Sustained tremolos for strings, long-drawn notes for wood-wind, and the roll of drums suggest the immaterial, shadowy condition of primitive humanity. From this background, 'void and without form,' emerges an important theme for the horns, marked 'Calm and contemplative':

Primordial chaos persists until the will of the creative spirit rings out imperiously in this motive, given by the trumpets:

Afterwards the vague, brooding atmosphere creeps back, but now it is informed with steadily increasing vitality. Another theme of contemplation:

*A bluish-lilac haze of light would accompany this chord on the tastitura per luce.

begins to alternate with Ex. 2, which by this time has passed in a somewhat modified form to the pianoforte. The awakening process has commenced, and presently this figure heard from the pianoforte suggests a sense of joy:

More animated. Joyous.

Now we follow the gradual stirrings of self-consciousness in man. But hardly has he learned the meaning of this fresh, crystalline gladness than he begins to experience languor, and a vague thirst for more intense vitality. This is seen in a short motive marked a in the example below:

The pianoforte continues to express the growing development of body and soul:

Human love and desire follow in the wake of the gift of 'Manas' (the Promethean spark). Joy is soon mingled with pain, for the conflict between the physical and the spiritual starts almost at once. The pianoforte has a passage labelled 'Voluptuous, almost with anguish.' To this succeed phrases of 'delight' and 'intense desire.' Reminders of the themes of contemplation often interrupt these erotic moods. A very important motive, which frequently recurs, is the following:

With rapturous emotion.
Solo Fl. & Cor. Incl.

The development of this idea continues for some time. We hear it passed to and fro in the woodwind against the soft trills of the strings, while kettledrums and bass-drum answer each other in muffled tones. The effect is veiled and mysterious. A fresh theme then appears in the violins:

Ex. 8.
Vl. With enthusiasm.

but its ardour is soon checked by a sinister phrase for the brass and a dull, menacing tremolo in the strings. The pianoforte replies with the theme of 'rapturous emotion,' now given in a broken rhythm, suggesting a state of strange fascination:

Strange, Fascinated.

Ex. 9.

The recurrence of the motive of creative will (the Promethean theme, Ex. 2) almost invariably heralds some marked emotional change in the music. By-and-by it ushers in Ex. 7, which now assumes a sudden sense of joy and gentleness. This mood is submerged in a section headed 'Defiant, bellicose, stormy.' There is a climax of great brilliancy before the conflict closes with a passage 'piercing as a cry.' After this, tenderness and a soft and radiant animation resume their sway. It is impossible to follow bar by bar the further development of the foregoing material. Ex. 7 is a predominant idea; Ex. 2 returns in augmentation, and Ex. 4 is also heard again.

As the music grows more joyous and ecstatic, this theme is introduced:

and soon afterwards we reach one of the great triumphant climaxes of the work. From this point onward we are met by a series of emotional waves, of no great volume of sound, but apparently intended to give an impression of intense effulgence and quivering light. Great use is now made of Ex. 6. The effects broaden and become increasingly dazzling until we reach the final Prestissimo with its dance-theme:

Ex. 11. Dancing, winged as in flight.

which grows more and more vertiginous, and works gradually up from pianissimo to a huge climax on the sustained triad with which the work ends.

ON THE MODERN LANGUAGE OF MUSIC.

By E. A. BAUGHAN.

On the 14th day of March in this year of grace Alexander Scriabin's 'Prometheus' was applauded with much enthusiasm by a very large audience in the Queen's Hall. On the 1st day of February a year ago the same work was played twice in one afternoon in order that it might be better understood. Between the two performances at that concert many people left the hall, giving it to be understood by their manner that their musical morals had been outrageously assaulted by Scriabin's music. Nor were audible signs of dissent wanting, although they did not swell to any considerable outbreak. In a little over a year, then, Scriabin has been accepted by a popular audience. How much that means it is impossible to say. The audiences at the Queen's Hall Symphony Concerts are not special audiences. To say that a tithe of the listeners who applauded Scriabin had any close knowledge of music would be a liberal estimate. But of this we may be certain: the audience was composed of men and women accustomed to hear the best music the world has made, and yet they accepted Scriabin. The same audience had previously applauded Schönberg's Five Orchestral Pieces, so that it was at least consistent. You could not read any reflection of that popular enthusiasm in the writings of most professional critics. They either sat on the fence in aloof amusement, or clambered down to throw a small pebble or two at the daring composers. These facts are set down here as material for the historian of the future, so that he shall not write of Scriabin having been cast out by the London public. Nor should that historian place too much reliance on the statements in the public prints that the composer of 'Prometheus' was honoured by the public because the public likes a new sensation. There may be something of that, of course. Léon Bakst, the gilded fairies of the Savoy Theatre, Tango Teas, 'Hypnotic' suppers, the new morality and night clubs, and the Futurist and Cubist painters are not isolated phenomena. They are an expression of change in artistic and social ideals. Moreover, it is a fashionable change. Has not a noble lady employed Cubist designers to decorate her dining-room? We may assume, therefore, that a certain section of the public applauds this new music of Scriabin and Schönberg because it is the latest mode. But it would be very wrong, I think, to assume that this artistic snobbishness was the only or even the paramount, reason why Scriabin's 'Prometheus' was so enthusiastically applauded. I can only judge others by myself. Scriabin and Schönberg have profoundly interested me. At the present moment I would rather hear a new composition of importance by either of these men than sit through the accepted 'beautiful' compositions on which my musical youth and early manhood were nourished. Am I decadent? Possibly; but then most great and original art is decadent to the Philistine. Michael Angelo, Rodin, Turner, Whistler, Monteverde, Wagner—here are a few great artists who were not at first beloved by the Philistine. Many others can be added to the list. Indeed, all the writers, painters, sculptors, and musicians who had something new to say have been considered either immoral or mad; and those who have admired them have been held up to scorn as possessing the same bad qualities without the excuse of genius. 'Decadent' suggests both physical and mental deterioration from the normal, sane type, and it is a blessed word.

I find Schönberg's and Scriabin's music of profound interest, then. I was musically reared on Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn; then on Chopin and Brahms, with an occasional dose of the early Wagner (what a revelation the 'Tannhäuser' Overture seemed!). Then I was fed on the patent and, as they say, the meretricious food of Wagner, and could touch no other until I had tasted Richard Strauss. During this period I have at times gone back to the plain, satisfying music of Beethoven, and the bitter-sweet stodge of Brahms. And for some twenty-two years (so the biographical dictionaries inform me—but I do not believe them) I have earned my living by analysing impressions received from music. These facts are by way of a plea of justification: forgive me if they seem egotistical or are wearisome! For the rest, I am not old enough to be content in watching the pageant of progress; nor am I so cast in the sere and yellow that I open the door to the younger generation rather than hear its nerve-racking knock. So that when I say this new music profoundly interests me, my statement may be received as honest and sincere, and be valued precisely for what it is worth.

We must focus this new music, however. We must try to see it in proper perspective and in its true relation to art. We are helped to some extent by our knowledge that both Scriabin and Schönberg (the latter especially) are composers who have shown in other work that they are masters of their craft. That is their plea of justification. Neither is a mere bungler. Nor are their experiments in harmony and (let me be antithetical!) in organic formlessness the isolated phenomena some critics would have us believe. I need hardly point out to readers of the Musical Times that the history of the development of music is a history of experiments. These experiments are in a sense recurrent. What Monteverde tried to do in his period, these modern men are doing now in theirs. Gluck led to Wagner (not musically, but artistically); Couperin and Rameau produced the Liszt symphonic-poems, and from them and Wagner sprang Richard Strauss; Debussy and Ravel are the forerunners of Schönberg and Scriabin; and on all these composers, from Liszt and Wagner to the present day, the genius of Chopin has had great influence. I do think, however, that Scriabin's and Schönberg's experiments are more drastic in their aims and in their accomplishment than any in the past. Going straight from Beethoven to Wagner's 'Tristan' (for one did not know Wagner in his chronological development), one was not so conscious of a different harmonic scheme as in listening to Scriabin even after Richard Strauss. The new men have certainly reached a new stage in the development of music.

It is not my intention to analyse the harmonic-style of either Scriabin or Schönberg. A full analysis would be of great interest, but it would not really enable us to appreciate what it is these men are trying to do with music. Their aim is not new. Indeed it has been the aim of composers for centuries to develop music as a psychological language. Theorists divide music into strictly defined classes. There are pattern-music and programme-music, and the hybrid of music-drama. But music will not be so classified. In the most formal of music there is passage after passage, and sometimes a whole movement, in which it is obvious the composer has attempted to make his art the expression of some thought or sensation. In parenthesis, I may urge that we require some new phrase to describe what it precisely is that men have tried to express in music. I have used the words 'thought' and 'sensation,' but they are quite inadequate, being too definite and too much the stuff which the language of words attempts to express. Except in a minor degree, say in a scene in a music-drama dealing with definite emotions, music does not seek to express emotion in the ordinary sense and certainly not thought. There is a realm in the human mind from which thought and emotion may be said to spring. It is subconscious in the ordinary man. In moments of exaltation the genius lives almost consciously in it. What he feels and thinks then are not definite emotions or definite thoughts, but a combination of both. Perhaps Martineau, in his 'Types of Ethical Theory,' puts the matter in a clearer light than is possible to me: 'Passion and emotion themselves are, in us, not without thought, and may be always treated as thought in a glow.' 'Thought in a glow' is a good definition of what music tries to express. The ordinary man feels this intellectual-sensibility in contemplating some idea or thing which moves him to feel what Martineau calls 'thought in a glow.' Music as a language more closely expresses this than words, for words are definite symbols for definite ideas or things, and the second process has to be undergone of translating the definite into the indefinite. Lyrical poets aim at this by employing words that have a curious association with indefinite thought and sensation, but as they are using a language of strict definiteness and logic the result is often obscure. Browning's 'poetry' is an example of this peculiar use of language. By dint of every possible literary artifice he tried to express the intellectual-sensibilities for which language has no symbols. But he was too definite, too logical, and for the most part his poetry fails in its aim. We get more suggestion from the almost meaningless music of a Shelley.

In writing music as the expressive medium for this 'thought in a glow' the modern composer is apt to forget one thing. Music as a composition of art has a logic and definiteness of its own. A long composition is built up of separate musical 'thoughts' which must have some kind of connection, otherwise you would have merely a string of disconnected phrases which may have seemed connected to the composer himself, who alone knew the basic inspiration which had been the motive force of his music, but cannot be grasped by the listener who has no such clue. Until all these intellectual-sensibilities are woven into a connected whole we merely have artistic expression in the crude. The composer has not put his 'thought' into the shape of art. Now, the shape of musical art has its own laws, just like any other manifestation of the human mind. You have only to attempt to write a small composition and you immediately become aware of the constructive logic of music. This logic for many generations of music-making was a matter of euphony. But what sounds well or does not sound well is purely arbitrary. We have long since discarded the expression of 'beauty' as the one aim of all art, for what used to be called beauty is now seen to be merely the expression of a certain type of feeling. We now use the word in a more indefinite sense as meaning the successful expression in art of an intellectual-sensibility which moves us. A want of spirituality is the real ugliness to a modern mind. Measured by the foot-rule of 'beauty' much of Wagner was condemned. Yet to-day the 'ugliest' passages of his music seem to us beautiful because they succeed in moving us in precisely the way the composer intended. Moreover, we have learned that the musical sense is very elastic. It soon accepts as pleasant and tolerable that which, at a first hearing, seemed harsh and unbearable. There is, then, hardly any limit to what the ear will accept with a little education. That disposes of most of the theories of music based upon euphony.

There still remains the supreme difficulty of the art-form and the logical exposition of musical ideas. Different attempts have been made from generation to generation to solve this difficulty. The older composers solved it by the architectonics of musical logic. The form of their works was based more or less on the same laws of reason and logic which govern other manifestations of the human mind. Thus a well-written leading article has the same logical basis as the sonata-form. That is a good logical basis if music-making is to be an end in itself, but that aim fetters the art as an expression of the indefinite intellectual-sensibilities which are its inspiration. You have music spinning itself out of itself. In searching for a connecting link which should not bind the expressive powers of music in iron fetters, the symphonic-poem came into existence. But this, with all its freedom, was still a formal affair. The attempt was then made to substitute a programme of meaning or description for a formal musical programme. That was the method of Liszt (for Berlioz's symphonic-poems are essentially formal music), and, later, of Richard Strauss. Even so, these composers could not away with formal connecting links. Moreover, even in Richard Strauss's works you will find that the meaning or programme is often obscured by the necessity of making music. There is no doubt that Wagner was right in his contention that drama should form the programme. In music-drama you have a definite outline to which the music can be worked. By not being obliged to think of the architectonics of music as far as the whole design is concerned, you obtain a very fluid medium for musical expression. The disadvantage is that a hybrid art is created, and that if music is to be given its full expression the drama is apt to be conditioned by that need, with the result that the stage becomes a trifle wearisome in its want of action and in its unnecessary length of treatment of scenes. These new men evidently desire to write programme music of a strictly psychological and subjective type. They do not desire to be bound to definite description, nor, on the other hand, to limit the expression of their intellectual-sensibilities by the need of creating a logical and architectonic music. They carry this so far that they expect us to understand the most violent ellipses of harmony. We are taken from discord to discord without a moment's relief. The mind has to supply the composer's omissions. We have to be able to think as he thinks. I submit that no printed programme enables one to do this. The programme of Scriabin's 'Prometheus,' for instance, is emotionally clear enough, and it is a splendid theme for music, since it suggests just the indefinite 'thought in a glow' which music does express so finely. The composer has conceived an effective musical form for his work, beginning with a mysterious lento and gradually developing to a supreme climax. But to much of the detail which lies between these extreme points we have no clue. It does not stand as music, and it is impossible to conceive what the composer means.

Is it not true that these modern men are so intent on developing music as a psychological language that they have almost ceased to make music at all as an art? If it is to stand alone it must have an organic, logical life of its own. A few disconnected thoughts thrown on paper do not make literature. They may be very interesting and suggestive, and one may detect a kind of connection between each thought, but until they be cast in a form which goes somewhere and does something they are but the rough notes for a literary work of art. That is how Schönberg and, to a less extent, Scriabin, affect me. Their rough notes and experiments in musical psychology are intensely suggestive, but one cannot look on the Five Orchestral Pieces or the 'Prometheus' tone-poem as anything more than rough sketches or experiments.

I also think that these composers, in so far as they are not making mere experiments, are rather misunderstanding the nature of the medium in which they are working. Music, unlike pictures or sculpture, cannot be grasped at once as a whole. The composer, as the literary man, has to rely on the cumulative effect of the separate thoughts which are part of the whole. The most daring example of the art of the Futurist or Cubist painter has the advantage of being seen at once as a whole. The brain may be baffled as to the meaning of the picture, but it has something to go upon—the whole pattern of the picture. That pattern is clear enough, although the details may be incomprehensible. These modern composers give us a mass of incomprehensible details which the mind of the listener has to form into a comprehensible whole. The old logic of form which wove musical detail from bar to bar until at the end of the composition the listener felt he had made a conception of it as a whole has no place, or none that we can yet recognise, in the music of these modern composers. Each detail often seems an appropriate illustration of a detached thought or emotion, but we cannot see the relationship of one to another. I do not wish to dogmatise, for music is not an art on which it is safe to do so, but these experiments in harmony must be woven into some logical art-form if they are to be anything but experiments. The very indefiniteness of music, which is one of its strong points, can also be one of its weaknesses. Music can be pushed so far as a psychological language that it becomes a jargon of symbolical sound with an arbitrary meaning which cannot be understood by anyone but its creator. In the meantime we should accept these experiments as an attempt to extend the boundaries of music, even if we cannot applaud them with the unquestioning enthusiasm of the popular audience that has no fixed theories to unfix, and is not burdened with critical and historical standards of musical taste.

THE CLASSICISM OF ARNOLD SCHÖNBERG.

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

It is characteristic of the bewilderment in which Arnold Schönberg's works throw us, and of the subtle power that lies hidden in them, that among those who follow the composer's progress with sympathetic curiosity and keen interest, many who are not directly attracted by his latest achievements should nevertheless be drawn towards them indirectly, and led earnestly to believe that there may be in those works a great deal more than appears at the first glance.

It is not the mysterious aspect of the works that does it: at least not wholly. Of course one of the first impulses of the rational music-lover, whenever he comes into contact with music of an unusual kind, will be, or should be, to ask himself Why the strangeness? and to expect that something justifies it which in due course he shall be able to grasp, possibly to enjoy. It is something even more indirect, yet more powerful than an intuitive, and on the whole more than half-unwarranted, belief of that kind. For instance, the readers of the Musical Times will remember, in Mr. Ernest Newman's article, 'A propos of Schönberg's Five Orchestral Pieces' (February, 1914) these lines:

'It is too late in the day to call Schönberg either a madman or a conscious charlatan. We now have too much fine music from his pen to be able to doubt that he has one of the finest musical heads of our day.'

And that alone, undoubtedly, is an argument which suffices to carry conviction, and to induce us to study with zeal and sympathy even the most recondite and unattractive music that he has given us.

There is another thing that should win Schönberg many votaries: his 'Handbuch der Harmonielehre,' published at Vienna (Universal Edition) in 1911, a wonderful book not only from the mere educational point of view, but even more, perhaps, from that of art-philosophy. It is replete with sound axioms, precepts, and definition; with views and comments of all kinds upon the art of music, the enjoyment of music, the spirit which should be that of the genuine creative artist, on all matters pertaining to musical art, written with so thorough an earnestness and singleness of purpose that the merest perusal of it teaches us to love and respect the author, and to give him full credit for being capable of proving his words by deed.

The book carries us far indeed from the current conception of Arnold Schönberg, the musical anarchist or mountebank, the enemy of form, style, and proportion, ever flying against tradition, and striving to build a monument to ugliness and confusion.

'One of the loftiest duties of teaching,' says Schönberg, 'is to awaken the true understanding of the past, and at the same time to open a field of view upon the future. Tuition, therefore, should be historical, so as to establish the connection between that which has been, that which is, and that which—according to likelihood—will come to be.

At the Royal College of Organists, on March 14, Prof. Percy Buck delivered a useful and interesting lecture on 'Arranging for the organ,' a subject which, quite independently, is dealt with by Mr. Harvey Grace in our columns this month. We defer our report of Prof. Buck's lecture, and comments thereon, until our next number.

That axiom brings us forthwith to the crucial point. It is absolutely, and always will be absolutely true, that no art-form, no art-style, possessing vitality can spring out of nothingness, nor even be actually antagonistic to what has been. However strange and abnormal they may seem to be, they must be tested with reference to tradition: a test that may, it is true, be carried out in more ways than one. To see the link between the art of to-day and the art of the classics is, indeed, one of the chiefest difficulties that the student of modern music has to cope with. He is generally tempted to seek for the more obvious kinds of analogies; and very often that is enough to lead him hopelessly astray, especially if he is incapable of guiding himself by other signs.

The method that seems the simplest and most rational, that is commonly resorted to, consists in trying to consider the unusual as the more or less laboured application of current rules, and to reduce it to usual standards: for instance, given one of the strange harmonic sequences that abound in Schönberg's music, to prove that by considering certain notes as appoggiaturas, certain others as anticipations, and so forth, it becomes possible to view the sequence in the light of four-part harmony as generally understood. This mere labelling and docketing is certainly useful for educational purposes—and especially during the first stages of education: but it has nothing to do with the appreciation of music. The mere fact that a chord does consist of notes which we may choose to consider as appoggiaturas, retardations, or whatever the case may be, does not in the least affect the æsthetical valuation of that chord. But the fact remains that for some people, to 'understand' music is to find labels for its constituent parts—a feat which in Schönberg's case is on the whole fairly easy, but which will be found, in other cases, harder.

'Our writers on æsthetics,' says Schönberg, 'consider the results of imagination as the results of peremptory laws; the possibilities of form as compulsory conditions of form. And, though they know art-forms that cannot be reduced to such standards, they go on writing their codes: they take advantage of the convenient word 'exceptions' to account for all that seems to prove them wrong.'

Further, he writes: 'There are absolutely no notes that are foreign to harmony, but simply notes to which the systems established by teachers of harmony are foreign.' To people who believe that music, first and last, consists in close observance of scholastic rules, the idea that a man capable of expressing himself thus could be considered as a classic is, no doubt, unacceptable. And they would find it impossible to agree with Schönberg's apparently preposterous assertion, that he descends in a straight line from the classical masters—an assertion which his votaries, to a man, have endorsed. 'Too much stress,' he recently told me:

'has been laid upon the fact that Mahler's influence has been and still is strong on me. That it is true I do not deny. But I have been influenced by all the great classical masters, not by Mahler alone. What I know I have learned through studying the music of Bach, of Mozart, of Beethoven, of Wagner, and of Brahms.'

The early works of Schönberg, and especially his first sets of songs (Opp. 1, 2, 3, 6: published by the Dreililien-Verlag, Berlin), which often bring us quite close to Hugo Wolf, to Brahms, or to Reger, and his beautiful string Sextet, 'Verklärte Nacht,' informed with real 'Tristanesque' spirit, justify the assertion thoroughly. The songs above all show that he began by working on altogether conservative, at times even scholastic lines. For instance, 'Abschied' (Op. 1, No. 1) is obviously the outcome of a laboured, somewhat ponderous method of writing which remains true to the spirit of conventional polyphony, and which no 'modernist' would even think of adopting deliberately. But following close upon that Op. 1, come songs which, though no less distant in the matter of both spirit and working out, from all that comes under the heading 'Modernism,' are of delightful freshness, and will fully appeal to the lover of Schubert ('Waldsonne,' Op. 2, No. 4; 'Hochzeitslied,' Op. 3, No. 4; 'Freihold,' Op. 3, No. 6; &c.). A remarkable point is that in many of the songs crop out now and then certain chords and patterns of unusual kind, out of which, subsequently, Schönberg will contrive his new idiom. For example, in 'Erwartung' (Op. 2, No. 2), we meet several aggregates like:

an early instance of the famous 'Quartet-akkorde' or 'fourth-chords,' which he uses so extensively, and to which a whole chapter of his 'Handbuch der Harmonielehre' is devoted. In the illustration above, the chord is easily explained and finds its resolution according to the strictest of rules. And in fact, in Schönberg's case it is always possible to find explanations that fit in, more or less closely, with current theories—a thing not easily done in the case of Debussy's music, or of Stravinsky's.

Up to Op. 8 (six songs with orchestral accompaniments) no great change is noticeable in Schönberg's methods. The tone-poem, 'Pélleas und Mélisande,' Op. 4 (1902), however, has generally been found inscrutable by the great majority of those who had heard it or read the score.

It affords a remarkable instance of Schönberg's primitive tendency towards accumulation of resources—a tendency in itself characteristic of most musicians in whom a conservative instinct is at cross-purposes with aspirations to be modern—intricate polyphony and heavy scoring.

Soon after come the pianoforte pieces Op. 11, the first work in which his new manner—the manner which culminates in the Five Orchestral Pieces recently played in London, and in the pianoforte pieces Op. 19—fully asserts itself. How are we to account for the sudden change? Schönberg himself in his book shows us the way to a proper reply :

‘The artist writes, not what others think fit and beautiful, but what he feels himself compelled to write. . . . When, having written music, you see that it is over-intricate, begin by asking yourself whether you were absolutely sincere when writing it. A true artist never uses novel, unwonted means, except to express something novel and unwonted. I do not recommend that the student should use “modern” means. He must simply learn how to use them, so as to be capable of doing so if ever his creative spirit calls for them.’

Here we have a great deal to go by. A great deal, and yet, when it comes to the last, very little that will help us to get any nearer deciphering the message hidden in the latest works. But we have at least the assurance that the message is there, coming from an earnest, sincere artist, who has tried his utmost to find the proper expression and to test it. Even as in his first works, in which he keeps so close to the straight, classical path, and displays so thorough a knowledge of his craft, and so intense a power of expressing himself, we find in his book the proof that his starting-point is sound. Whether we shall ever be able to follow him up to the point he has reached, whether it will not be decided that he has gone astray, remains, as Mr. Ernest Newman pointed out, an open question. It is not given to every artist, however sincere, however enlightened and purposeful, however instinct with wonderful conceptions, fully to achieve all that he conceives. And it is quite possible that time will teach us to measure the distance between Schönberg’s dreams and his achievements. But we may also learn that he has succeeded in carrying out his intentions, and thereby become the richer by new emotions and a broader field of view.

To many younger artists, Schönberg has come as the first capable of expressing certain hitherto latent ideals: his pupils, Anton von Webern, Alban Berg, Erwin Stein, Karl Linke, Robert Neumann, Egon Wellesz, have confidently mustered around him, and believe in him unreservedly. A little book printed at Munich in 1912, ‘Arnold Schönberg,’ bears full testimony to that effect, and its last chapter consists of a series of papers in which the composers named above (several of whom are already known by a number of published works) explain why they found Schönberg’s teaching the fittest and best, and how he has taught them to express themselves. It is, indeed, a wonderful tribute, and one of which any teacher might well be proud. It is therefore not unreasonable to believe that in due time the group of those who understand Schönberg’s art and love it will grow larger. Events are proceeding so fast, that indeed such a time may be nearer than we think. But when it comes, Schönberg or another will probably have written some new work which will contain other occasions for bewilderment. The history of art is full of similar instances; and the art-student has never done with learning.

THE DISCREPANCIES BETWEEN PRESENT MUSICAL THEORIES AND MODERN PRACTICE.

BY A. EAGLEFIELD HULL.

It is never a very grateful task to complain of the present state of anything. Still less so when the indictment concerns the position of such a beautiful science as musical theory. However, there comes a time when the experiences of our difficulties become so acute that we must perforce cry out for relief. The difficulties of the teacher of musical theory, harmony, and practical composition appear quite slight in comparison with the Gargantuan struggles of the young student as he vainly tries to reconcile the text-book precepts with the practice of modern composers. Therefore such an inquiry as the present seems to be a real duty. So let us proceed with our arraignment of the present position of musical theory, with its possible errors and obvious deficiencies, and see if we cannot make out a strong case for a real modernising of the text-books.

Not the least unpleasant part of our inquiry is the fear lest we should be thought of as slighting such old and well-tried friends as Ouseley, Stainer, Macfarren, and Prout. But even the newer books of Stewart Macpherson and McEwen, Bridge and Sawyer (all most excellent in their way), do not take the student one inch further in the approach to the modern developments.

This may be accounted for by the fact that whilst Ouseley, Stainer, and Prout theorised right up to the art of their day (i.e., to Wesley and Spohr in the one case, and to Wagner in the other), the English text-books written since then have avowedly been founded largely on their predecessors, instead of on the then existing practice. No attempts whatever on the part of English theorists have been made to join the present developments to the work of the past. Yet it is quite easy to see in many of the present-day tendencies a legitimate growth from the older practices. Strauss started with Mozartean qualities, Schönberg with a few simple, almost naïve, songs, Reger with long-spun ground-basses which sound like early Buxtehude, and so on.

In Germany and France, too, where the modern practice of composition has made such enormous strides, the theoretical works lag strangely behind. Arnold Schönberg's own 'Harmonielehre,' modern as it is in the newer consideration of orchestral colour, repeats without comment the old rules laid down by Jadassohn. Although published so late as 1911, it altogether ignores French 'impressionism' and modern Russian technique; and, moreover, contains no exercises at all.

In France, quite the ablest theoretical work is that of M. Anselm Vinée—'Principes de l'harmonie, théorique et appliquée.' But he devotes a large part of his book to the consideration of the 'just' tuning and the supposed chameleon-like mental changes of a note according to its accompaniment,—a specious subtlety which he has to let go, of course, as soon as he is fairly launched into the discords. Louis Villermis's 'L'Harmonie ultra-moderne' deals only with one small phase of modern music, the working in simultaneous harmonic planes. The book is interesting, but the examples given do not suggest a very great outlet in this direction. More important is the brochure of M. Lenormand, entitled 'Etudes dans l'harmonie moderne,' a work devoted to a consideration of the technique of 'impressionism.' Its usefulness is somewhat circumscribed by the limitation of the examples to composers of French nationality. It assumes that the "impressionist" technique of sound was an invention of the Parisian composers. This is not so; for the Germans, and especially the modern Russians, were well before them in this field. These last two books are isolated works, descriptive of one particular phase, and making no efforts at unification with the past.

Enough has been said to prove the existence of a great gulf between the point where the textbooks 'let go' and the rise of many modern tendencies in the art. Surely it is high time this gulf was bridged over.

Are, then, the disagreements between modern art and the older theories vital or secondary? Is it hopeless to attempt to bring the two together? We are inclined to think not. By a little 'give' on the part of the theorist and a little 'take' on the part of the modernist—by a loosening of the autocratic, law-giving attitude on the one hand, and the abandonment of the self-consciousness of the extremist on the other—we see the whole development welded together. For the purposes of this inquiry, we will follow just a few broad lines, such as the necessity for the relaxation of the older rules, the admission of new scales, of new systems of chord formation, and of new procedures such as elision and freer treatment of dissonance.

Were we ever quite satisfied with the old 'laws' of harmony? Let us take a few of these.

I.—'No two parts may proceed in perfect fifths.'

It is true that certain exceptional cases are mentioned by nearly all the theorists, but there are scores of passages in modern music which do not come under any of these so-called 'exceptions.' Nor are such cases confined to the modern masters. Numbers of similar progressions may be found in Bach, Beethoven, Schumann, and Mozart. The consecutive fifths in the Chopin example are sanctioned in many of the harmony books, whereas the fifths between the bass and soprano at the first and second asterisks in the MacDowell example would hardly escape the examiner's blue pencil any more than those at the third and fourth asterisks. The theoretical works are entirely silent however on the Ravel procedure by fifths—a ubiquitous practice nowadays.

Obviously there must be some principle which the theorists have overlooked.

II.—'The extreme parts may not proceed by similar motion to an octave or fifth.'

Here are two beautiful phrases from the older composers which spring to mind. Comment is needless:

Ballade in F. CHOPIN.

Ex. 5.

III.—(From an examination paper): 'Which three common chords may be taken in their second inversions?'

What answer is expected, when composers now use 'six-fours' on any scale degree whatsoever?

IV.—'Certain chromatic common chords are allowed: a major common chord on the supertonic; one on the minor supertonic; and a minor common chord on the subdominant of the major key. The chromatic chords of the minor are available in the major, but those of the major may not be used in the minor.'

Why all this unnecessary parsimoniousness, when Wagner, Strauss, and Reger have shown us how to use a chromatic chord on every degree of the major or minor scale without for one instant obscuring the sense of tonality?

V.—'No two parts may proceed in seconds, sevenths, or ninths with each other.'

What, then, are we to say of the seconds in Debussy's 'Images,' No. 3; of the many beautiful progressions by ninths in César Franck's Symphony; of the dominant ninth progressions in Ravel's 'Pavane,' and of hundreds of examples such as the following?

'Pelléas et Mélisande' (p. 233).

EX. 6.

The reply may be given that this is Impressionism, pure and simple. Granted; but there are scores of similar cases which appear to be formed from the contrapuntal progression of the parts. Witness the sevenths between the tenor and bass in the exquisite cadence of 'Don Quixote':

'Don Quixote.'

STRAUSS.

EX. 7.

Such progressions as this were used by German and Russian composers long before the Frenchmen made such a special feature of them.

All this must be regarded as a plea for a much more untrammelled view of musical harmony and a greater and wiser laxity in part-writing.

We must now consider briefly the question of the new scales—diatonic, tonal, and duodecuple (or scale of twelve equal divisions, as on the pianoforte), the new chordal constructions, the completely altered view of discord, and the methods of elision as practised by the later composers.

More than half the new music of the highest type now written is founded on some scale other than the well-worn major and minor series. These may perhaps be mere transpositions of the mediæval modes, but they are derived by other methods than those of the Renaissance. In Elgar's early period the composer uses a scale of a minor second and an augmented fourth. Wolf-Ferrari, in the 'Jewels of the Madonna,' favours the augmented fourth. Here is an example of a minor scale with a major sixth from the last Leeds Festival (1913):

'Shropshire Lad.'

EX. 8.

The present-day French composers more frequently adopt the following series for their minor key:

EX. 9.

Then we have the great developments of the tonal scale, the newer series of the later Sibelius and the 'scale-chord' of Scriabin. And last and most formidable, there is the 'duodecuple' scale of Ravel, Strauss, Rébikoff, and Schönberg. What help has the present student of musical theory in facing this great problem of the scales?

Whatever may be said against the 'unusual' discords of such a passage as the following, it cannot be accused of being unsupported by theory. It affords an excellent example of the regular sequential possibilities of 'duodecuple' harmony:

EX. 10.

'Valse nobles.'

RAVEL.

Moderato.

Take away the uppermost part, and we have a somewhat ordinary sequence. Note the regular rising of the bass by fourths. Over this the treble moves in a long semitonal line, and such a procedure with a regular sequence in the bass is not unknown in the so-called 'classics.' The last chord is explained as an exact transposition of the preceding one, a course followed freely by all the modern composers.

Still less assistance does the student get in the direction of the new systems of chord-formation. The old fundamental 'generator' idea has rightly been thrown overboard, but we still hang too hard on to the system of chord-building by unequal thirds. Ravel, Bantock, Debussy, and Rébikoff (to mention four composers only) have shown how some of the most lovely combinations are formed by structures of seconds, fourths, and fifths. Many of these which have been derived from the 'whole-tone' scale have been cleverly analysed already in the Musical Times by Mr. G. H. Clutsam (November and December, 1910). We give three examples of less usual formations which owe nothing to the 'whole-tone' scale:

EX. 13.

Schönberg's favourite chord appears to be the one composed of two superimposed fourths, one augmented; and he does not resolve it in the conventional way, but repeats it after the manner of the Impressionists:

Vas. (Acqpt. fig.)

SCHÖNBERG, Op. 16, No. 4.

EX. 14.

The principle is, we suppose, that if a certain chord creates a particular impression, we strengthen that impression by immediately repeating it on various degrees. Or, again, it sounds reasonable that if a characteristic combination has once appeared, that in itself has prepared the ear for its repetition on another note. There does not seem to be anything in the 'elision' theory, namely, that Schönberg takes his resolutions for granted, and so omits them.

An altogether altered look has come over the face of discord. The principle of discord can only be one thing, viz., the clash of two contiguous alphabetical notes—i.e., the interval of the second. To the modernist, the major second is accepted as a concord, and far from 'walking delicately' with the minor second, he assiduously cultivates it as one of his most valuable assets—on the louder side for dramatic emphasis and sonority, on the softer side for intrinsic beauty of tone. Scores of passages from Liszt, MacDowell, Ravel,

Debussy, Cyril Scott, and Rachmaninov prove this. Should the reader be inclined to think this is all very well on instruments, but insufferable on voices, let him hear the following intensely beautiful passage, and immediately be converted:

'Christ in the Wilderness.'

BANTOCK.

EX. 15. Místico.

Then there is still that 'giant' discord of Beethoven's ninth Symphony to be explained on theoretical grounds:

EX. 16.

The theory of simultaneous streams of harmony has yet to be explained. Notwithstanding, from the time of Beethoven's overlapping echoes in 'Les Adieux' Sonata, we have a regular string of examples through Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung' (Coda) and Balakirev's 'Islamey,' up to Sibelius's latest Symphony, in which the wind section of the orchestra works in A major whilst the strings proceed in the E flat tonality.

It is this contrapuntal writing by streams of harmony, instead of by melodic lines, which accounts for so much in Schönberg's Five Orchestral Pieces—that is, after we have become familiar with his unusual chord formations. These, by the way, have been used by Ravel, Stravinsky, Rébikoff, and others. What Koechlin has done contrapuntally with streams of consonant harmony, Schönberg has effected with streams of what, at present, we call dissonant harmony. What composers of the ultra-modern French school have done with harmonic planes in the diatonic method, Schönberg has effected with pedal figures and chords founded on the 'duodecuple' or 'twelve-note' scale. If the mass of people cannot listen sufficiently horizontally to follow three or four melodic lines in a fugue, it is not surprising to find them unable to grasp such a piece of contrapuntal thinking as that, say, on page 12 in No. 1 of the Five Pieces, where we have a duodecuple-scale subject on the strings appearing together with its simple augmentation on the trombone and xylophone, and its double augmentation on the muted trumpet. At the same time, the horns have harmonic writing in two planes, the bass pedal figure, A flat, C D appears on the harps and drums, and all this is placed over the 'ground-chord' of the piece, D A C sharp!

The theory of elision has been well treated in Schönberg's 'Harmony,' but the principle of resolution has yet to be successfully captured. Both Chopin's Prelude in F and Schumann's song, 'Im wunderschönen Monat Mai,' end on a chord of the minor seventh, and the student is again found gazing blankly at his text-books, which declare emphatically that 'the seventh requires a certain definite fixed progression to complete its effect.' What, then, is he to say when faced by the strange endings of Scriabin, Stravinsky, Cyril Scott, and others?

The subject is far too wide to be treated at all exhaustively in this article; but we hope we have pointed out at least some of the avenues which the present-day theorist might enter in order that the harmony student may not feel that his text-book work comes to a full stop when he approaches actual composition. The student will then feel fewer discrepancies and less difficulty in reconciling the text-book rules with the music which he is playing, singing, or hearing continually.

Occasional Notes.

In our last number we drew attention to an article on 'The relation of Music to Poetry,' contributed by Mr. Alfred Hayes (of Birmingham) to the Atlantic Monthly (for January, not February as we erroneously stated). Mr. Hayes contends that music by its almost inevitable method of dealing with poetry destroys the very factors that constitute and give value to a poem. He says:

A beautiful poem, just in so far as it is a beautiful poem, satisfying in emotional and intellectual expression, exquisite in diction, is outraged by being set to music. Violence is done to it in several ways: the rhymes lose their effect through the lack of correspondence between the musical phrases and the verbal phrases; the accented notes in the music often do not coincide with the stress in the verse; the time of the music is often at cross-purposes with the metre of the poetry; a single word of the poem is now brutally dismembered, now stretched on a musical rack of many bars, now flung from pillar to post, especially in choral-writing; and, finally, worst outrage of all, the direct intellectual and emotional appeal of the poem is drowned in the flood of pleasure which the music directly and overwhelmingly bestows.

This is a formidable and relentless indictment, which the writer proceeds to drive home by adducing examples. Yet it must not be assumed that Mr. Hayes concludes that no poetry should be set to music, for he admits that:

Music is so desirable an end in itself that a poet who loves music may well be content, nay proud, to assist her even at his own expense. . . . The injury is only temporary, and is sustained in a splendid cause. . . . Swinburne's superb verse [in 'Atalanta'] has already been borne on the wings of Granville Bantock's music into hundreds of homes which it would never otherwise have reached.

A large subject this! We cannot do it justice in a note, and are content at present to give a brief account of Mr. Hayes's well-considered and well-expressed argument.

THE PROSAIC of subjects are casting their nets wide. IN MUSIC. Mr. Joseph Holbrooke has set to music the woes of 'The small-holder,' dwelling with unktion on such uncomfortable details as worms and sweat, and Mr. Bainton, in 'The vindictive staircase,' has sung of the ghost of Mrs. Murphy haunting the staircase she so often scrubbed when in the flesh. Others of our composers are producing quasi-political works. It is well that our poets and musicians should at times leave the realms of faëry and abstraction and concern themselves with the concrete; but they must not in their haste suppose that because a thing is real and a 'slice of life' it therefore calls for musical expression. The line that separates the calling that may be seriously sung about from that on which we must be mute is a fine one. Thus the peasant is a picturesque figure, and you may invoke the muse on his behalf, always provided that you consider him in general terms. When he becomes a hedger or ditcher the poet will have none of him. Also you shall find the shepherd a goodly man to chant of, but you must be silent about the equally useful man with a far more arduous task—the driver of pigs (was not Leigh Hunt's delightful essay 'On the graces and anxieties of pig-driving' refused by a cautious editor on the score of its vulgar title?). The sailor, whether afloat or ashore, invites to song, but the indispensable individuals in greasy overalls who attend to the stoking and engines have so far found never a composer and but one poet—Kipling. So you may tune your quivering lyre in honour of Mercury, or a messenger, always provided he is not the homely one who announces his arrival with the figure:

Much the same thing holds good in the feathered and animal world. Those quite useless fowls the nightingale and the cuckoo, in spite of the notoriously loose principles of the latter, are favourite subjects, but the homely bird to whom we owe the breakfast egg still awaits its poet. Dukas, in his 'L'Apprenti Sorcier,' sees to it that the deluge is stopped, as it was started, by magic. Some of our young English composers would have brought on a plumber.

THE GRAND OPERA at Covent Garden affords a striking answer to those who affirm that Wagner's popularity has passed its zenith. Although the five-weeks' season recently concluded was almost entirely devoted to four of Wagner's later works, the season to open on April 20 will include two complete cycles of 'Der Ring' and two performances each of 'Lohengrin,' 'Die Meistersinger,' and 'Parsifal.' The conductors, we are glad to note, will be Arthur Nikisch and Albert Coates.

The Italian and French operas, which will carry the season on till July 27, are the following: 'L'Amore dei tre re' (Montemezzi); 'Le Nozze di Figaro,' 'Don Giovanni' (Mozart); 'Rigoletto,' 'La Traviata,' 'Un ballo in Maschera,' 'Aida,' 'Otello,' 'Falstaff' (Verdi); 'Cavalleria rusticana' (Mascagni); 'I Pagliacci' (Leoncavallo); 'Mefistofele' (Boito); 'La Bohème,' 'Madama Butterfly,' 'Manon Lescaut,' 'La Tosca,' 'La Fanciulla del West' (Puccini); 'I gioielli della Madonna,' 'Il segreto di Susanna' (Wolf-Ferrari); 'Noël' (d'Erlanger); 'Francesca da Rimini' (Zandonai); 'Faust,' 'Roméo et Juliette' (Gounod); 'Samson et Dalila' (Saint-Saëns); 'Louise' (Charpentier); and 'Pelléas et Mélisande' (Debussy).

Sir Joseph Beecham announces another season of Grand Opera and Ballet at Drury Lane Theatre, to last from May 20 to July 25. He will have the co-operation of the Russian Opera Company, that did such magnificent service last year, and M. Diaghilev's Ballet. German opera will also be given, the following being the complete list for the season :

Prince Igor	Borodin.
Coq d'Or	Rimsky-Korsakov.
The nightingale	Stravinsky.
Night of May	Rimsky-Korsakov.
Boris Godounov	Moussorgsky.
La Khovantchina	Moussorgsky.
Ivan le Terrible	Rimsky-Korsakov.
Der Rosenkavalier	Strauss.
Der Zauberflöte	Mozart.

The list of artists includes Madame Kousnetzov and M. Chaliapine; the conductors are Mr. Thomas Beecham, M. Emile Cooper, and M. Leon Steinberg.

The list of Ballets to be mounted is as follows :

Daphnis et Chloé	Ravel.
Antar	Rimsky-Korsakov.
Midas	Steinberg.
Petrouchka	Stravinsky.
L'oiseau de feu	Stravinsky.
Le lac des cygnes	Tchaikovsky.
Scheherazade	Rimsky-Korsakov.
Narcisse	Tcherepnine.
Thamar	Balakirev.
Cléopâtre	Rimsky-Korsakov.
	and Glazounov.
The legend of Joseph	Richard Strauss.

The chief centre of attraction will of course be the first production here of Dr. Richard Strauss's new ballet, 'The legend of Joseph,' under the composer's direction. The story is that of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, in a 17th-century Italian setting. In the opinion of one who has seen the score, the music 'marks a departure for Dr. Strauss. It is written with great breadth and strongly-marked melody. The style might metaphorically be said to be a "scene-painter's style."' The conductors of the Ballets will be Mr. Beecham, M. Monteux, M. René Baton, and Dr. Richard Strauss.

On March 19 (Feast of St. Joseph)

POPE PIUS X. a sacred concert was given in AS A St. Peter's, Rome, the chief attraction of which was a Latin Hymn COMPOSER. to St. Joseph, words and music by Pope Pius X. It is not generally known that the Pope, when Patriarch of Venice, cultivated music strenuously, and composed some Motets of more than ephemeral interest. During his recent illness he wrote a charming Latin hymn entitled 'Salve animator Josephus,' and set it to music, and expressed a wish that it should be sung by the celebrated Sistine Choir, under the baton of Dom Perosi, at St. Peter's, on the Feast of St. Joseph. One of the audience describes the Motet as 'very pretty'; but one thing is certain, that the composition is a striking tribute to the musical powers of one of the hardest-worked rulers in Christendom, especially when it is borne in mind that the Pope will celebrate his seventy-ninth year on June 2. It may be added that in 1894 His Holiness 'discovered' Perosi, whom he brought with him to Rome.

Dr. Charles Harriss has returned to London from his home in Canada in order to rehearse the Imperial Choir, the first meeting of which took place very successfully in the City Temple on March 4.

WHOLE TONES: A little pamphlet devoted to an HINC ILLÆ advertisement of Vladimir Rebikov's LACHRYMÆ. compositions quotes the following touching notice of a performance :

Musical Courier. New York, November 8, 1913.

'The Christmas Tree' is written in the modern scale of whole tones, and on account of it the melodies and harmonization are of quite unusual order. They never fail to produce a deep impression, for the composer is really gifted and his measures show unusual fertility, resource, and real inventive power.

The audience was carried away by the beautiful strains and wept copiously. He has adopted the new principles and new forms in music, has a distinct genius and preference for short pieces, and has much power in melodic expression. He is a great thinker. He is distinctly (!) a reformer in intention.

From Punch :

"Mr. G. Dyson, who succeeded Mr. W. S. Bambridge as organist at the College a little over two years ago, is leaving to go to Rugby, as organist there. Since he has been at Marlborough Mr. Dyson has given a large number of much-appreciated recitals in the College chapel. The organ is still undergoing repair."—The Standard.

'We make no comment. This is Rugby's affair, not ours.'

"A recital was given yesterday afternoon by Dr. Walter Alcock, who bears the title of organist and composer to His Majesty's Chapels Royal, and assistant-organist of Westminster Abbey, and happens to be also an organist of exceptional attainments."—

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

BY HARVEY GRACE.

VI.—OF ARRANGEMENTS AND DISARRANGEMENTS.

Time was when our profession was sharply divided on the question of organ arrangements. The Purist raised shocked hands and said 'I never play them,' and looked askance at his brother who did, regarding him as little better than one of the wicked. The past few years have seen a general breaking down of fences in all directions, and the purist in this as in other matters is a very rare, if not an extinct, fowl.

The changed attitude of the Royal College of Organists is significant. Not many years since, when candidates for Associateship were allowed to choose their own test-pieces, a candidate who elected to play a transcription would have come badly off, as the Syllabus expressly laid it down that the work should be 'written for organ.' Nowadays the Council includes one transcription in its Fellowship test-pieces. More, at the time of writing, I note that Dr. Buck is announced to lecture at the College on the subject, with a view to helping organists to make arrangements off their own bat. This is a complete right-about-face—much as if the powers-that-be converted the Old Bailey into a lecture-room, with Mr. Justice Darling holding classes for instruction in the higher branches of crime.

Let me hasten to say that this extreme analogy is made in no complaining spirit. The action of the College Council in this respect has undoubtedly been a good move. The weak spot is their apparent inability to find any arrangements of music by composers other than Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Mendelssohn.

The organ arrangement, having been thus blessed where formerly it was banned, has come to stay, and on many grounds it may be heartily welcomed. Just as heartily to be condemned are the tendencies (a) to arrange for the organ music quite unsuited to the instrument, and (b) to play an undue proportion of arrangements.

If there were a scarcity of real organ music, ancient and modern, and of the highest class, arrangements would be a necessity. The most enthusiastic of transcribers will surely not assert that there is such a dearth, and arrangements therefore have to some extent to justify themselves. This they may do, first, by bringing to frequent hearing compositions of the older school which for various reasons are neglected. For example, there is a wealth of charming old music for the various obsolete keyed instruments. Much of this may be played with admirable effect on the lighter organ stops. Some of it is even more suited to the organ than to the pianoforte. Indeed the music composed for a two-manual harpsichord is barely possible on any other instrument than the organ. There is also much old music for strings, which well bears transference. Secondly, organ arrangements may be useful in making the public familiar with modern works which otherwise might rarely come to their ears. The average member of the average church congregation, knowing little of Debussy, may be helped in this way, since about twenty of his works are now available for organ use, and most of them lose very little by being transcribed. The pianoforte pieces even gain in some respects. For instance, the pedal organ gives a sustained bass over which shifting harmonies may be played with greater clearness than on the pianoforte, where the most careful use of the damper pedal can hardly avoid some confusion. There is also the advantage of being able to use more than one tone-colour. Much modern pianoforte music that is not specially pianistic in idiom may be thus brought to the ears of the man in the pew, who rarely frequents pianoforte recitals. Thirdly, organists in districts where orchestral concerts are few and far between, may do good work by acting as substitutes, and providing their hearers with transcriptions of good orchestral music.

Here, then, are the three justifications for transcriptions:—(a) the keeping alive of good old music, (b) the making known of good new works, and (c) the deputising for the orchestra when necessary.

All this, of course, is with the proviso that the arrangement does the minimum of violence to the composer's ideas, and that it is suitable to its new medium.

One is glad to know that many organists are doing good work by their use of arrangements under these conditions, and with gain to their own musicianship. Indeed, arrangements deserve a welcome, if only for the service they have done the player. No organist who has given a good rendering of a transcription of a work for strings is ever likely to be satisfied with the slovenly phrasing that is too often a feature of organ playing. In the matter of balance and colour, too, he will be all the better for the study of arrangements. In a word, good transcriptions will do much to help him out of the groove into which he is liable to drift.

When one considers how generally the principle of adaptation has been recognised by composers of all ages, it is surprising that organ arrangements should ever have been objected to. Those who still have any lingering scruples may be reminded that Bach made no bones about the matter; nor did Handel, who showed himself ready not only to re-use his own material, but to adopt other people's as well. Appropriately, he has also provided more matter for the hand of the arranger than has any other composer. His choruses are now so rarely used as organ solos, that we can hardly realise the vogue they once had. Some idea may be gathered from a ponderous volume at my elbow, 14-in. by 10½-in. bound in thick cloth boards. It contains 130 choruses filling 360 pages, and the arch-arranger, W. T. Best, is responsible for it. It was published by Cocks & Co., at £2 2s. to subscribers and £3 3s. to others.

The industrious organist who bore this portly tome to and from his organ-loft must needs have been a good man of his hands, needing little more in the way of physical training. Add to these 130 choruses the countless versions of Handel's instrumental movements (Best's Handel Album alone contains about a hundred) and one sees that not only did the obsession of the great Saxon check our native school of composition, but that his blighting shadow fell across the organ-loft as well. Long before the Best arrangements appeared, the choruses were a standing dish with our organists. Is it any wonder that an English school of organ music is still a vision? While our forefathers were playing 'organized' Handel, the Germans were busy with real organ music. They have an unbroken line from Bach's predecessors even unto Karg-Elert. The French School, though of recent growth, is already in being, and highly characteristic. The English organ composer has no tradition, nor does he show any signs of making one.

The greatest bar to his doing so is the influence of the transcription—always used far more in England than on the Continent. As a result of the elaborate arrangements of the music of Wagner, Tchaikovsky, Dvorák, Brahms, &c., our composers often write for the organ in the idiom of the orchestra. This is only one of the evil results we owe to the abuse of a good thing. As was said above, such arrangements do good service in popularising music which would otherwise be rarely heard, and their use in the more remote provincial towns is justifiable. They had their place in London musical life some years ago, but now that orchestral concerts are plentiful, they lag superfluous. If they dealt with less familiar works one would not complain; but they travel over the ground worn smooth by many seasons of Promenaders. It was never part of an organist's duty to help in doing to death a few popular works. Still less is it the case now, with the picture-theatre orchestras and pianists able and willing to do the job more thoroughly. 'Elizabeth's prayer,' 'Lohengrin's farewell,' 'The 'bridal chorus,' 'Prayer for Rieni,' 'Procession to the Minster,' 'O star of eve,' 'Album-leaf in C'—what have these and their like to do with the real Wagner? Would they ever be heard to-day had the composer written nothing after 'Tannhäuser'? Yet some of our leading recitalists are not above dishing up such inanities. With a certain Prelude in C♯ minor, a 'Chanson Triste,' a Cavatina—there is no need to give the composers' names, since there is but one Prelude, one Cavatina, and one 'Chanson Triste'—with these and other threadbare favourites, the early Wagner extracts have earned a long, long rest, so far as the organ is concerned. Of the bigger Wagner transcriptions it may be said that many come under the head of disarrangements. The rendering producible by the finest organist on the finest organ is but a pale reflection to those who have heard the work in its proper form. No organ can give us, as can the strings, a gradual crescendo from a whisper to a fortissimo.

Instead, we hear additions to the power coming on in chunks. Consider, too, the organ stops that do duty for the brass. Where is the nerve-shattering sforzando, or the growth from a velvety murmur to a blast as of doom, which are commonplaces with the brass family of the orchestra? As a typical passage, take these two bars from the 'Meistersinger' Overture:

Who can fail to be stirred by the crescendo and fortissimo of the passage in thirds for the brass? How much of the effectiveness of such passages remains when transferred to the organ? This Overture suffers rather badly at the arranger's hands. You may hear an organist give you this:

Now, Wagner gave the scale-passage to the strings (omitting first violin), and the chords to the brass and wood-wind. When played by the orchestra, the scales give one the impression of being lightly flicked across the solid mass of sound provided by the brass. It is a mere decoration. More, Wagner, careful to avoid any lumbering or confused effect, gives the double-basses only the skeleton of the scale, thus:

And we are asked to accept for this a noisy pedal glissando, with (through the Great coupler) reeds and 16-feet speaking—or rather half-speaking. Much the same thing occurs later in the Overture, where the first violins and violas have the figure in octaves, against the chords of the brass. When played by the orchestra these passages are scarcely heard. Yet you may hear them given to the Great organ full! Another example of violence to a composer's intentions is to be found in a popular arrangement of the 'Siegfried Idyll,' where a passage for one horn marked f is given to the Solo organ reeds ff. Also the fortissimo marks in the tutti passages are transferred to the organ version, regardless of the fact that a fortissimo of the combination for which Wagner wrote this particular work is a very different thing from that of a big modern organ.

Again, I remember a passage in a string-quartet, marked ff, being given in an organ arrangement to Great ff! It would be easy to fill columns of this journal with a list of such vagaries. Many are due to the arranger's slavish adherence to the original. The best translation of a book is that which gives us, not an exact rendering, but a good piece of literature in the new tongue. The less it smells of the process the better. Organ transcriptions should be, above all, satisfactory quâ organ music. Our French friends set us a good example in this respect. They are not afraid of leaving things out, and rarely do we find their arrangements other than clear. Many English transcriptions suffer from the arranger's attempt to retain as much as possible of the original. The result too often is that we cannot hear the music for the notes. Double pedal, both hands 'thumbing'—what has the nose done that it should not lend a hand, so to speak? Finally, what is to be said in defence of programmes entirely devoted to transcriptions? I may be told that they attract the public. It may be so, but surely that should be not the first, but one of the last, considerations with an artist. Moreover, a man owes a duty not only to his art, but to his professional brethren. Here, for example, is A, doing his best to educate his hearers in the matter of real organ music, giving them the best of both ancient and modern. Along comes B, and plays a programme of transcriptions of hackneyed works. Of course the man in the pew prefers it to the sterner fare of A, for much the same reason that the donkey eats thistles. Well may A, with some bitterness, proceed to deal faithfully with B, in some such strain as the following: 'Do you think it is cricket to come tickling the ears of the groundlings, just as I am getting them to like better things? You look on me as being behind the times, because I don't give Wagner programmes and Tchaikovsky recitals. My dear fellow, do you know that those of us who are jealous for the honour of our instrument and its music are playing music by Vierne, Karg-Elert, Reger, Jongen, Widor, and others,—strong meat for men, beside which your 'Elizabeth's Prayer' and 'Chanson Triste' and most of your other threadbare arrangements are as skimmed milk for puling babes? You are ten years behind the times, playing such works in London, but you pose as an up-to-date musician,—or even as one in advance of his fellows.'

'O wad some power the giftie gie us——'

[An examination of the organ recital programmes received during the past month proves our contributor's closing remarks to be well-founded. Here, for example, is a programme played in London by a well-known recitalist: '1812' Overture, 'O star of eve' ('Tannhäuser'), Prelude to Act 3, and Bridal music ('Lohengrin'), Overture 'Rienzi,' 'Peer Gynt' Suite, 'Chant sans paroles' (Tchaikovsky), and March ('Tannhäuser')—truly a dish of chestnuts!—ED., M.T.]

CORRIGENDA IN EXCELSIS.

The examination candidate of to-day is well cared for in the matter of text-books and other helps to the acquirement of laurels. The latest of these is an imposing catalogue of printer's errors in the test-pieces for the R.C.O. Examinations in July, 1914. The lynx-eyed scrutineer has done his work thoroughly, claiming to have discovered no fewer than 132 mistakes in the twelve pieces. This is a formidable list, but a careful examination shows his discoveries to partake largely of the nature of a mare's nest.

We have space for only a few of the results of our examination, so for the sake of convenience, will confine ourselves to one of the works. In the Fantasia and Fugue in G, by Parry, our detective pillories thirteen alleged errors. Let us look at them. (The passages in italics are quoted from the circular.)

Page 1, line 2, bar 2. Add pause over the crotchet rest on the fourth beat in middle staff. Certainly the pause should be there, but as it is over the right-hand and pedal parts the player is not affected by the omission. Of course, a candidate with a meticulous desire to make no pause where none was wanted might go on with his left hand alone, but we hardly think it likely.

Page 1, line 3, bar 3. Add a natural to F and a flat to D on the last quaver, left hand. Both accidentals have already been applied to the two notes earlier in the bar. The change of clef does not make their repetition necessary, especially as both the F natural and D flat appear simultaneously in the right hand.

Page 3, line 1, bar 2. Add a natural to the last semiquaver E in right hand. Here our friend is right, though the E natural is so clearly indicated by the context that nobody is likely to play anything else.

Page 4, line 2, bar 1. Add a sharp to the F on fourth beat in left hand. Again an error too obvious to be dangerous.

Page 5, line 1, bar 1. The B flat on second half of third beat is a quaver and demisemiquaver. The tie here makes it impossible to mistake the composer's intentions.

Page 7, line 3, bar 1. Add dot over the last notes in left hand. Why? The composer evidently wants all the passage played tenuto, and has marked the beginning of the group accordingly. There is nothing to show any need for the dot.

Page 7, line 4, bar 2. End of the slur between bars one and two should be over the E. This particular 'find' is worth reproducing. Here it is:

Corrected it is:

It is well that candidates should be saved from such a pitfall as this!

Page 13, line 4, bar 1. Add semiquaver G in right hand in last chord. It seems pretty clear that the G was omitted for the convenience of the player, as it appears in the next chord. Here is the passage:

Played rapidly, the passage is better without the G referred to.

Page 14, line 2, bar 1: Add quaver rest in right hand after quaver E. If these few alto notes are to be regarded as a separate part, there should also be a crotchet rest before the A, and more rests are necessary in the next bar. The passage is quite clear as it stands, and the addition of rests would be of no practical use.

Page 16, line 3, bar 2. The crotchet D in left hand should be a dotted quaver tied to a quaver. The passage is wrong as it stands, but we disagree as to the amendment. It should be a quaver tied to a crotchet.

Page 18, line 3, bar 1. The Vivace should probably be marked forte. Most players would make a reduction in the power for this passage, for the sake of clearness and contrast. It is implied by the crescendo leading to ff. Of the remainder of the 132 mistakes the majority are of the above kind. Some indeed are not musical matters at all. For example, three are concerned with the omission of a full stop after 'Sw.' and 'Gt.'! Page 265, line 2, bar 5. 'Add dot after Sw.' is the solemn admonition. How such a point can affect the candidate or anybody else we fail to see. Indeed, after carefully going through the list, we shall make bold to say that any candidate who was led into playing wrong notes through these errors shows himself so lacking in musicianship that he deserves to fail.

At the second of the Orchestral Concerts given by Mr. F. B. Ellis, an organ work by César Franck, 'Pièce Héroïque,' was announced for performance, not on the organ,—the Queen's Hall instrument is rarely used for any other purpose than providing a religioso background to Handel's 'Largo' and the like,—but by the orchestra, in an arrangement made by Mr. Geoffrey Toye. The prospectus speaks of the work as being singularly little known in England, even among organists. That much-abused fraternity must plead guilty to neglecting much fine organ music, but their withers are unwrung in this case. The 'Pièce Héroïque,' thanks to its inclusion in the R.C.O. Syllabus, happens to be the one important work of the great Frenchman that is tolerably familiar in this country. It is to be hoped that a result of this familiarity will be not contempt, but a desire to make acquaintance with the even finer 'Pièce Symphonique,' the Finale in B flat, and the beautiful Prelude, Fugue, and Variation. Our organists may be allowed the tu quoque that Franck's Symphony in D minor, and the Symphonic-poems, 'Les Eolides' and 'Le Chasseur Maudit' might well receive more performances than English orchestras give them.

Mr. Julius Harrison, the rising young conductor and composer, has just resigned the post of organist at Union Chapel, Islington, which he has held for four years, as he finds his increasing engagements at Covent Garden and elsewhere leave him no time to devote to his church appointment. Union Chapel has for many years been noted for the excellence of its congregational music. It is a little remarkable that in the space of seventy-one years, only seven organists have held the post which Mr. Harrison is just resigning. Of these one was only organist for a few months, which practically reduces the number to six. Several very eminent names are included, notably Dr. Gauntlett (nine years), Prof. (then Mr.) Ebenezer Prout (thirteen years), Mr. Charles Forington (five years), and Mr. Fountain Meen (twenty-nine years), succeeded in 1910 by Mr. Julius Harrison. It is greatly to be hoped that an organist may be found who will carry on the old traditions which have placed Union Chapel musically in the foremost rank of the London Free Churches.

The fine old organ in the beautiful Collegiate Church of St. Peter, at Wolverhampton, is being thoroughly modernised, the work being undertaken by the original builders, Messrs. Henry Willis & Sons. This instrument, which has remained untouched since 1882, occupies a curious position. Owing to the small size of the arches under the central tower the choir stalls are placed in the nave, and the organ is bracketed high up above the chancel arch of the nave. Such a unique position is only shared, we believe, by the organ at Holy Trinity, Stratford-on-Avon, but whereas at the latter Church the organist occupies the same lofty position, at Wolverhampton the console was placed in the choir stalls, with long trackers running up the wall. It was undoubtedly a wonderful example of first-class organ building of the period; the length of the Swell trackers extended to fifty feet, and yet the touch was as light as that of the Great, which had a pneumatic lever: truly a remarkable tribute to the genius of Father Willis.

The new console will occupy the same position as the old one, and the rebuild will include tubular-pneumatic action throughout on the Willis well-known 'pressure' system, adjustable combinations, electric blowing, &c. When complete, the instrument will be among the finest examples of organ-building in the Midlands.

The Rev. Walter Marshall, Vicar of St. Patrick's, Hove, gave a lecture on the 'Barless Psalter' at St. Paul's Cathedral Chapter House on February 18. The lecture included an attack on the use of bars in the 'Cathedral Psalter.' But the non-use of them is not the novelty the lecturer seemed to suppose it to be. At least two 'barless Psalters' have been in wide use for some years past, viz., the plainsong Psalter edited by Stainer, Briggs, and Frere, and the Rev. G. H. Palmer's 'Sarum Psalter.' The lecturer's views as to what constitutes good chanting are incontrovertible, but we venture to suggest that good chanting depends far more upon the choirmaster than upon the system adopted.

A recital was given in St. Giles's Cathedral, Edinburgh, on February 14, by Mr. John Hartley and the Cathedral choir, for clergy and organists who are interested in the forthcoming 'Scottish Organists' National Psalter and Service Book,' as compiled by Mr. Herbert Westerby, of Kirkcaldy. A demonstration of several specimen chorale settings was given, taken from three classes. It included simple syllabic tunes in the older chorale form, comprising 'Old London,' 'Old 148,' 'Old 29,' and 'Coleshill,' and embraced the period from 1635 to 1707; more florid transition tunes, of which 'Oxford' was given as an example; and modern Scottish tunes.

At the Lutherkirche, Cologne, six interesting organ recitals were recently given by Ferdinand Schmidt. The programmes were designed to show the organ music of Bach in comparison with that of his predecessors, contemporaries, and successors. The programmes included specimens of Bach's music played in juxtaposition with (1) Frescobaldi and Pachelbel, (2) Handel, (3) pupils of Bach, (4) Schumann and Mendelssohn, (5) César Franck, E. Bossi, and Widor, and (6) Karg-Elert and Schmidt.

An organ scholarship at Girton College, to the value of £30 per annum, and tenable for three years, will be offered for competition in June of this year. Forms of entry and particulars may be obtained from Miss M. Clover, 'Coleby,' Grange Road, Cambridge.

The congregation of the Parish Church, Brighton, have presented Mr. Chastey Hector, the organist and choirmaster, with the Oxford Mus. Bac. robes and an illuminated address.

Mr. William Jones has just completed sixty years as organist at St. Cuthbert's, Hadsall, Lancashire. The occasion was marked by the presentation of a purse of gold to Mr. Jones and a brooch to Mrs. Jones.

An appeal on behalf of the restoration of the organ at St. Nicholas Cole Abbey has been issued by the Rector. The old instrument has been the means of giving pleasure to so many through the weekly recitals of Mr. Herbert Hodge during the past twenty-eight years, that a generous response is deserved.

In our March number, p. 173, the possession of the Father Smith organ was erroneously ascribed to Mr. Seymour Pile instead of to Mr. Seymour Powell.

Mendelssohn's '42nd Psalm' was sung at the Primrose Hill Chapel, Northampton, on February 15th. The soloist was Madame Ella Mallison. Mr. F. A. Facer conducted, and Mr. W. Jones was at the organ.

On February 18, at St. Mary's Church, Athlone, Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' was sung by the choir, under the direction of Mr. F. H. Haywood. The solo was sung by Miss I. Oliver. Mr. C. Swanton was at the organ.

Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' was sung in St. Bartholomew's Church, Dalston, on March 4, under the direction of Mr. Clement Meek, the organist and choirmaster. The soloists were Miss Winifred Meek, Miss Aimée Evetts, Mr. Sidney Waterman, and Mr. Herbert Evison. Mr. Walker Robson was at the organ.

Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was sung by the choir of Walton Parish Church on March 11, instead of the usual choral evensong. Mr. Albert Orton presided at the organ, the solos being taken by members of the choir.

Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' will be sung at the Parish Church, Richmond, Surrey, on April 1, with orchestral accompaniment. The soloists will be Miss Winifred Marwood, Mrs. Grace Ratcliff, Mr. Alfred Steer, and Mr. Montague Borwell. Mr. Sydenham Rouse will conduct.

Reviews.

Liber Usualis Missae et Officii cum Cantu Gregoriano ex editione Vaticana adamussim excerpto. A Solesmensibus Monachis diligenter ornato.

[Tournai : Desclée et Socii.]

It is almost unnecessary to say anything of the well-known Liber Usualis, compiled by the Monks of Solesmes: it is an indispensable work for Catholic choirmasters, and is a compendium of the Graduale and Antiphonarium—containing all the choral services for Mass and Offices throughout the year. The present edition has been thoroughly revised, and is enriched with rhythmical signs according to the use of Solesmes. All the music is taken from the Vatican edition, and bears the imprimatur of the Vicar General of Tournai, dated January 14, 1914. In addition to the music for Mass and Offices, there is also given the music for the Blessing of the Oils on Holy Thursday, for the Ordination Service, and the rite of Confirmation, while several other chants are given in the Appendix.

The format of the volume is small 8vo, and though it runs to 1,605 pages it is quite handy, owing to the music being printed on India paper perfectly opaque. Needless to add, the typography, music setting, and general get up are worthy of the firm of Desclée et Socii, who are printers to the Holy See and the Sacred Congregation of Rites.

The land of little people. Part-song for A.T.B.B. Words Anon. Music by E. W. Naylor.

May-day. Part-song for A.T.T.B. Words by Heber. Music by J. B. Lott.

Soldier, rest! Part-song for S.A.T.B. Words by Scott. Music by David Stephen.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Naylor has set some pretty lines very tunefully, with the voice-parts laid out in a free and interesting manner. The part-song gives good scope for a refined and skilful quartet, though the music is not very difficult. Mr. Lott, in his setting of Heber's well-known lines, adopts the glee style of the older writers such as Webbe and Callcott, and to those who enjoy the practice of straightforward choral-writing, his part-song may be commended. David Stephen's 'Soldier, rest!' contains some admirable descriptive touches, such as the passage for divided tenors and basses, the first treble part at mention of 'the lark's shrill fife,' and the bars dealing with the bittern, 'booming from his sedgy shallow.' The music is a blend of the archaic and the modern, much of the writing being modal, but all very interesting and original.

The Universal Music and Dramatic Directory, 1914.

[E. Risacher, Paris, and H. Bonnaire, London.]

This portly volume of over 1,100 pages contains a mass of information regarding musical and theatrical people and institutions. As the original compilation emanated from Paris, it is natural that France should loom large in proportion to other countries. But the English section is fairly comprehensive. It occupies 324 pages, whilst Germany is let off with only thirty-four. The volume is adorned with numerous small portraits, and to these are added short biographies, many of which are apparently autobiographies and go to show that hitherto the world has known little of its greatest men and women. The volume is undoubtedly a useful one to all who have dealings with the trade and profession here and on the Continent.

Adagio and Allegro Spiritoso. Balthasar Galuppi. Arranged by Sir Frederick Bridge. Organ arrangements, No. 48.

Grand Chœur. By Claude E. Cover. Original Compositions for the Organ, No. 444.

Romance in A flat. By H. Sandiford Turner. Original Compositions for the Organ (New Series), No. 29.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

The work of the 18th-century Italian composer whose name is so familiar to readers of Browning, was played at the centenary of the poet in Westminster Abbey in 1912.

Mr. Cover's 'Grand Chœur' is a bright work in postlude style, of a very moderate degree of difficulty.

The 'Romance' is a tasteful recital work, well above the average of the lighter kind of organ music. The composer has something to say, and says it very expressively. The piece is not difficult, and can be played on a two-manual organ.

Arethusa. Ballad for Chorus and Orchestra. By W. H. Ibberson.

[J. Wood & Sons, Ltd., Huddersfield.]

This is a setting for chorus and orchestra of Shelley's ballad 'Arethusa.' The music is vigorous and generally expressive, and shows that the composer has ideas; but the vocal parts move together rhythmically to the point of monotony, and even the freer rhythm of the accompaniment scarcely atones for this. Then the soprano part is on the whole low: only once or twice for a note or two does it go over F. The music presents no great technical difficulty.

Albums for the Organ. No. 5.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Twelve pieces are included in this collection, eleven being by living English composers, viz., J. Stuart Archer, W. Faulkes, Harvey Grace, H. M. Higgs, A. Hollins, J. N. Ireland, E. H. Lemare, B. Luard-Selby, John E. West, and W. Wolstenholme. There are sixty-nine pages of music, and the album, like its predecessors, is a most useful work for both voluntary and recital purposes.

Jubilate Deo. Set to Music by John Ireland. Parish Choir Book, No. 911.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Ireland has set the canticle in a tuneful, straightforward fashion, with no repetition of words. The music is easy, but contains plenty of interest.

THE REFORM OF CHURCH MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I have read Mr. Bennett's article on Church Music in the March number of your journal with special interest, because it seems to me that he is one of the first of those who have taken part in this discussion to have shown sympathy both with the clerical and the musical point of view.

As a rule, the clergy encourage their congregations to take an active part in the services, to join audibly in the responses, canticles, and hymns; and some clergymen would like to hear the people's voices singing the Psalms and the Communion Service as well. But while organists complain that the clergy do not appreciate their good anthems and voluntaries, is their own sympathy with this particular object of the clergy always a hearty one, and are they always willing and anxious to do what they can to further it? No doubt it is disappointing to a choir-master when the incumbent prefers Sullivan to Wesley and Barnby to Brahms; yet have not the clergy, as the leaders of the people's worship, some right to complain when popular hymn-tunes are played at so high a pitch, so great a speed, and so rigid a tempo that no trained layman can sustain them, and the congregation is gradually reduced to a sulky silence? Unfortunately this lack of hearty sympathy with congregational singing is found widespread among all grades of the profession, except perhaps the lowest. Sometimes it is avowed; sometimes while he renders lip-service to the clergyman's ideas, the organist makes little effort to disguise his lack of interest in popular hymnody and his determination to do nothing to assist it. Only occasionally does one find an organist who loves congregational singing and has been at the pains to learn the difficult art of leading it.

Sir, if organists fail sometimes to find the clergy sympathetic towards their art, let them pause to consider whether they too should not try to do to others as they would themselves be done by. For as long as they fail themselves to enter into one of the objects which many of the clergy have at heart, and think even of popular chants and hymns in terms of four voices and organ, so long must they not be surprised to find these same clergymen suspicious of the organist's ideals and unsympathetic towards the choir; so long, too, must they expect to find the unmusical clergy disposed to discourage the use of anthems which they are not themselves able to appreciate.—Believe me, your obedient servant, CLERICUS.

FOLK SONGS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I was brought up at a country town in Scotland, and have a vivid recollection of one of the folk-songs in your March number. But my version differs considerably from that given by Mr. Edmondstone Duncan. I may add that the song and melody as I have written them were much in use by street singers in my younger days, some forty years ago :

It's for the want of pock - et mon - ey, And for the want of cash, . . Gars mo - ny a bon - ny lad - die For - sake his bon - ny lass. . .
CHORUS.
For I am bound to go, my love, Where no one shall me know : . . But the bon - ny las - sie's an - swer Was aye "No, no!" . .

MUSIC IN PREPARATORY SCHOOLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—Allow me to endorse what was written in your March number by a Farnborough schoolmaster.

In our School here we have a choir of twenty-six boys and some ten or twelve adults. We do a cathedral service every Sunday, and we give some of the most valuable singing scholarships to boys in England. Thirty per cent. of the boys learn the pianoforte and other instruments.

We consider our music one of the features of the School.

G. C. HODGSON.

Mostyn House School, Parkgate, Cheshire.

Obituary.

We regret to announce the following deaths :

In March, M^{LE}. MARIE CHASSEVANT, at Geneva. She was known, mainly in Switzerland, in connection with the elementary system of teaching music which bore her name. She was about seventy-eight years of age at the time of her death. For many years she taught at the Geneva Conservatoire. The basis of her system is an appeal to the ear and the appreciative faculties. Some progress has been made in the establishment of the method in this country. An English edition translated by Miss Marian P. Gibb has just been published by Mr. William Heinemann.

Mr. WILLIAM FREDERICK BAILEY, who passed away on February 21, in his eighty-fourth year. Mr. Bailey will be well remembered by very many in his long connection with the Royal Albert Hall, which commenced before the opening of the Hall in 1871 and terminated in September, 1901, by his retirement. In his early life Mr. Bailey was well known as a skilful trumpet and cornet player.

GIUSEPPE BUONAMICI, suddenly, at Florence, on March 18, aged sixty-eight. He was one of the most distinguished of Italian pianists, and a great favourite with all who knew him as an artist and a man. He was a pupil of Liszt and Bülow. His last appearance in this country was at a London Philharmonic Concert given on July 5, 1890, on which occasion he played Beethoven's E flat Concerto.

Mrs. H. W. YOUNG, on March 5, at the age of eighty-eight, who sixty years ago was well known to the musical public as Madame Helen Percy.

We regret also to announce that on February 26, the death of Mr. PUTMAN GRISWOLD, the well-known bass vocalist, occurred at New York. Mr. Griswold studied at the Royal College of Music.

'PROGRESS AND PEDANTRY.'

The above was the title of a paper read before the Musical Association on March 17. Written by Mr. Thomas F. Dunhill, it was read by Mr. John Ireland in the author's absence, due to ill-health. The paper said it had been stated that the music of the day had reached a stage where everything we had learned to reject was made an important ingredient; if so, we had to believe either that modern music was perverse or that what we had been taught was something insecure and futile in the face of modern developments. The great masters of the past were experimenters, seizing upon what the builders before them had rejected, and making of it a new kind of beauty. Conventions seldom became conventions without good reason, and to assume that what was conventional was of necessity bad was a hopelessly wrong attitude. Nothing wholly mischievous secured prolonged general acceptance, and though many conventions were often brushed aside, they survived and were alive again when the 'fashions' that banished them were forgotten. The standards of beauty of the past were not overthrown by any new developments that occurred. However beautiful Strauss and Stravinsky may prove to be, Bach and Mozart were still beautiful, and the laws they obeyed mean something.

Strict counterpoint was in every way the finest training for a musician that had yet been devised. The value of harmony was less certain : it was not governed by rules which were perfect in themselves. Mr. Dunhill suggested that for the advanced student there should be a considerable relaxation of the rules with regard to the resolutions of discords. Just as in former days all discords had to be prepared, so he thought the necessity for rendering chords in certain definite ways was becoming less and less insistent. A good many chords might be better understood also if the ordinary theory of appoggiaturas could very greatly be extended.

By way of reaction against the formal teaching of the past, the excellent idea of training pupils to listen more attentively had been brought into prominence. Special stress, however, had been laid upon the dry features of the old-fashioned music, and the half-closes and cadences, and the tiresome stock modulations, were dilated upon. These, which fell into their natural places in the music of Haydn and Mozart, did not constitute the main merits of the music, and to recognise them did not imply musical appreciation of any kind. Its result was to centre the listener's attention upon the things that mattered least in music, and only an infinitesimal proportion of those who were trained in this way would reach any stage beyond the power of recognising elementary stock progressions and quite obvious key-relationships in old-fashioned scores. The really musical child would hear these things for himself, if he wanted to. The child with an ordinary hearing faculty would be in very great danger of losing some of the power of appreciation which he might possess. We should be chary of displacing a natural source of beauty and pleasure in art. It were better to appreciate the secret loveliness of something which one understood only vaguely, and remain in awe of it, than to pull it to shreds in order to distinguish one by one the ingredients of which it was compounded. A musician should be trained through his ears and not only through his eyes, and frequent use should be made of the pianoforte in harmony teaching to show why certain things should or should not be done.

The theorist must take note of all things, and not be blind to the influence of anything he could not believe in himself or did not wish to explain. He might be sceptical of unproven experiment, but he should always take stock of passing events and be conversant with even the most whimsical turns of fashion. If he could preserve an even judgment, steer a straight course, influencing and steadying those who were impatient, guiding and encouraging those who were slow of pace, he would continue to exercise one of the most useful functions in the profession, and while still a pedant in name, would, by holding constant converse with the spirit of progress, proudly join the forces which were marching towards a new inheritance.

At the conclusion of the paper a lively discussion took place, the speakers being Dr. Maclean (the chairman), Mr. Stewart Macpherson, Dr. Borland, Mr. Ashton Jonson, Mr. Statham, and Dr. T. Lea Southgate. It centred chiefly round the subject of musical appreciation, the nature of which it was warmly urged had been entirely misapprehended by Mr. Dunhill.

MR. HUBERT BATH.

The successor to Mr. Carl Armbruster, who has recently retired from the post of musical adviser to the London County Council, is Mr. Hubert Bath. His duties in connection with the work of the people's outdoor orchestras during the summer months will be extensive, as about sixty parks and pleasure-grounds are supplied with music by the Council.

Mr. Bath is a prominent member of the circle of younger British composers. He has produced serious music of considerable merit, but has won greater esteem by his lighter works, such as 'The wedding of Shon Maclean' and 'The wake of O'Connor,' the first production of which, at Cardiff, is noticed in this issue. He has had considerable experience of orchestras, having toured the world as one of the conductors in Mr. Thomas Quinlan's Opera Company.

THE ORIANA MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

The thirteenth concert given by this Society, at Queen's Hall, on March 10, was a notable and successful event. It was notable because the programme contained no madrigals and because it brought forward skilfully-chosen music by British composers (the only exception being the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' Overture) that proved remarkably acceptable to a large audience; and it was successful not only because of the excellent choice of music but because every item in the programme was performed exceedingly well. The choir of 150 singers showed quite virtuoso powers. Fine resonant tone, clean unified attack, ability to expand to great sonority, capability of great delicacy on the technical side, and skill and insight in interpretation were all there. The choir needs more tenors and basses to balance the brilliant and full tone of the sopranos and contraltos. The chief item was the weird setting by Frederick Delius of Walt Whitman's touching poem 'Sea-drift.' This is written for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra. It is a work that has tried the mettle of some of the best choirs in the country, and we feel bound to say, after hearing most of the performances that have been given, we recall none that was quite equal to that secured by the conductor and his fine choir. Mr. Thorpe Bates was at his best in the solo part. Balfour Gardiner's 'April' was another item superbly performed. Here this composer has revelled in fancifulness and originality. The first performance of Gustav von Holst's setting of the 'Hymn to Dionysos' (from the Bacchanal of Euripides), for female-voice choir and orchestra, was an event of interest. Mr. von Holst has found himself in treating words of this mythical kind, and the present instance is a favourable example of his peculiar genius. A group of North-country folk-songs admirably harmonized for choral effect by Mr. W. G. Whittaker (a well-known Newcastle musician, who conducted) were very much to the taste of the audience. As sung by the choir they were irresistible in their appeal. It was in the choralists' ability to enter into the spirit of these dainty arrangements that they displayed their versatility and fine training. The other numbers performed were the orchestral piece, 'On hearing the first cuckoo in spring,' composed by Frederick Delius, and Percy Grainger's arrangement of 'We have fed our sea for a thousand years.' Mr. Kennedy Scott conducted all the pieces except the North-country songs. The orchestra was thoroughly efficient.

'THE ROMANCE OF THE ROSES': CANTATA BY OLIVER KING.

The St. Alban's Philharmonic Society deserve much credit for their revival of the above-named Cantata at the concert they gave on February 24. The work was published some twenty years ago, and has suffered quite undeserved neglect. The words are by Ellis Walton; they unfold a conventional love-story, and are admirably written for musical purposes. It is one of the advantages of the work that only two soloists are required, a soprano and a tenor, the customary villainous bass being dispensed with in the story. For chorus there are peasants and village maidens, and the accompaniments are written for orchestra. Mr. King writes fluently and skilfully for both voice and instruments, and although his music presents no repellent entanglements, it has a sufficient dash of modernity to impart interest even to 20th-century ears. The choral parts especially are well 'placed' for the voices, and they provide ample contrapuntal variety. One of the most effective numbers is a duet for the soloists which is concerted with the choir. There is a charming song for the soprano 'Tell me, breath of morn,' and another, also for soprano, 'Roses, roses on the stream,' is equally successful. The tenor solos are lyric and dramatic in turn. 'Fairest forms have met my gaze' is one of the most effective. The duets are a strong feature of the work.

As to the performance on this occasion it is gratifying to record that it was very satisfactory. The choir was small, but the singing was earnest, and there were obvious evidences of careful and skilful training. The soloists were Miss Florence Fleming and Mr. John Collett. Both are very capable singers, who had taken pains to know the music thoroughly and to realise the message of the words. The orchestra, which was led by Mr. F. W. H. Matthews, was a mixed one as regards ability, but barring occasional bad moments it did remarkably well. Mr. G. Mason filled in at the pianoforte, and Mr. Walter Gardner was a thoroughly efficient conductor. A miscellaneous selection completed the evening's programme.

With reference to our biographical sketch of Sir Edward Cooper, Mr. Alfred Hunter informs us that Sir Edward is a member of the Parish Clerks' Company. In order that he might be duly qualified he was appointed Parish Clerk of St. Michael's, Cornhill, through the good offices of the then Rector, the late Canon Bell. Sir Edward occasionally reads the Lessons at St. Michael's.

The

Competition Festival Record

No. 69.

THE season's competitions are now in full swing. It is evident that the whole movement is in a highly-flourishing condition. Our list of dates includes twenty-five events to be held in April, and twenty-two in May. Some of those to be held in May are in the most important centres of competitive activity—Birmingham, Morecambe, Kendal, &c. The Stratford competition began with much promise on March 21. This will be reported in our May double number. The senior competitions, held at the People's Palace on February 26 and 28, are fully recorded in the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW. Many northern readers will care to note that the great Blackpool Festival has been fixed for October 12 to 17, and that three fine new choral songs by Sir Edward Elgar are features of the choral tests.

There were also competitions between Church or Chapel choirs in two classes, Hazel Grove Wesleyan coming out first in the Mixed-Voice Choirs, and St. James's, Sutton, in the Male-Voice Division.

The Hazel Grove Wesleyans (Mr. J. W. Harapp) also gained premier place in the Open Class for Mixed Choirs, in which the tests were Morley's 'Fire, fire, my heart' and Spohr's 'God, Thou art great.'

SHEFFIELD SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

The sixth annual musical competition in connection with the Sheffield Sunday School Union was held in the Montgomery Hall on March 14, 16, 17, 19, and 21. A larger number of entries had been made than on any previous occasion. All sections are restricted to members of Sunday schools or churches and elementary school within a 25-mile radius of the Hall, and one, for junior choirs, to those affiliated with the Union. There was marked progress in the work of the competitors. The sections for Female-Voice Choirs, Elementary School Choirs, and Male-Voice Choirs in particular produced some excellent singing, and the instrumental section (pianoforte and violin) contained some really able players. The most regrettable fact in the Festival was the lack of entries in certain classes, notably those for Rounds and Catches, and for Mixed-Voice Quartets.

The attendance of the public, though not large, was sufficient to show there exists at least a nucleus of interest. The two principal prizes, the Eaton Shield and the Adam Shield, were again awarded to the holders, the Stocksbridge Congregational Senior and Junior Choirs. Both these Choirs are conducted by Dr. W. M. Robertshaw, a most enthusiastic amateur who is doing a great work in that industrial village and its neighbourhood.

Musical score for "The List" by J. S. Bach. The score is in G major (one sharp) and 3/4 time. It features four staves: two vocal staves (Soprano and Alto) and two piano staves (Right and Left Hand). The vocal parts enter with the lyrics "Let all the list'ning earth be" and "ev'ry tongue, Be God's sur-pass-ing glo-ry sung; Let all the list'ning, list'ning earth be". The piano accompaniment begins with a series of chords in the right hand and single notes in the left hand, marked with dynamics like ff and f.

'THE DREAM OF GERONTIUS' AT ROCHESTER.

When the obsequies of Elgar's 'The dream of Gerontius' were pronounced after its production at the Birmingham Festival of 1900, frequent allusions were made to the extravagance of the choral writing. One could tolerate a new type of expression and choral painting, except that it made demands upon the attention, which it was idle to expect choralists to comply with. As all the world knows, 'The dream of Gerontius' did not die. A German doctor of the name of Strauss found abundant life in the body, English enthusiasts helped in the work of revival, and now the work is sung and loved throughout the length and breadth of the land. The work which once puzzled a Festival choir is now becoming common property among choral Societies great and small even in the South. We now have to place on record that it has been given with notable success by a Southern choral Society of not more than 150 voices, and still in its second season.

This enterprising body is the Rochester, Strood, Chatham, and Gillingham Choral and Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Edward Carwardine. The performance took place at the Rochester Corn Exchange on February 25, with a contingent of the London Symphony Orchestra assisting, and Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Stewart Gardiner as soloists. The most conspicuous feature of the choral-singing was its confidence and ease. Each section of the choir was a compact unity, thoroughly trained, so that the music was always, even in the most involved parts of the chorus of demons, clearly defined. Considerable effect was gained from the co-operation of the Rochester Cathedral Choir, the boys' voices lending a distinctive tone to the semi-chorus. There was room for more sensitiveness here and there in the choral expression, but in this respect, too, the performance ranked high. Mr. Carwardine showed himself master of the score and of his forces, and deserves warm congratulation upon the success of the venture. All that depended upon orchestra and soloists was, of course, in safe hands.

'THE WAKE OF O'CONNOR.'

Special distinction attached to the concert of the Cardiff Musical Society on February 18, inasmuch as the Society gave the first performance, under the composer's direction, of Mr. Hubert Bath's new Cantata, 'The wake of O'Connor,' and the first performance in Wales of Mr. Hamilton Harty's Leeds Festival novelty, 'The Mystic Trumpeter.' The new work gave in its performance all that a perusal of the score had promised. From 'The wedding of Shon Maclean' and similar works Mr. Bath has evolved a stronger style, and in 'The wake of O'Connor' he achieves not only the vivacity and brogue of his first success, but a touch of pathos and a suggestion of mysticism that does not weaken in over-statement. The Cantata 'performs' well, and with the advantage of the Cardiff Society as interpreters was extremely effective. 'The Mystic Trumpeter,' a work written on a more serious plane and requiring a more sustained dignity of interpretation, was performed under the direction of Mr. T. E. Aylward with a success that revealed the varied capacity of the choir. The solo parts in the two works were taken by Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Thorpe Bates.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

'Parsifal' succeeded beyond the expectations of the most sanguine, extra performances being given in addition to the announced dozen; while Méhul's 'Joseph' completely failed to attract. These productions were noticed in our last issue, and we have now to record that 'Die Walküre,' 'Tristan und Isolde,' and 'Die Meistersinger' were mounted, and that the last-named seems to have a firmer hold on the public affections than ever. The chief feature of the 'Meistersinger' performances was the Hans Sachs of Paul Bender—a great figure in every sense. Walther was played by Robert Hutt, and others. The gratifying success of Mr. Albert Coates as conductor in 'Tristan' and 'Die Meistersinger' is referred to in our leading article.

London Concerts.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Gounod's still-popular Oratorio 'The Redemption' was performed by this Society at the Albert Hall on February 25, under Sir Frederick Bridge's direction. Years of change in musical taste and ideals may have altered its appeal to modern ears as dramatic or devotional music, but melodiousness always tells, and 'The Redemption' is rich in melody. The public took an interest in the performance, and the large audience that arrived had the satisfaction of hearing an effective interpretation in which both choir and soloists took an honourable share. The latter were Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Emily Shepherd, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, Mr. Ivor Foster, and Mr. George Parker.

THE EDWARD MASON CHOIR.

This energetic organization continued its efforts on behalf of the English composer on Wednesday, March 18, at Queen's Hall, before a large audience, whose enjoyment was obvious. Of the eight short choral works performed, five were for the first time, viz.—'The Small Holder' (Josef Holbrooke); 'That land' (H. V. Jervis-Read); 'The vindictive staircase' (Edgar L. Bainton); 'The death of Admiral Blake' (Montague F. Phillips); and a set of Choral Hymns from the 'Rig Veda' by Gustav von Holst.

If Mr. Holbrooke's contribution to the scheme was not entirely convincing, the fault lay chiefly in his choice of subject. The tiller of the soil is not an un-heroic figure save when, as in this case, he whines about his lot. The accompaniment for brass band was not happy. Mr. Jervis-Read's 'That land' marks considerable advance in every way on one of his earlier works ('Dream Tryst'), sung before it at these concerts. 'The vindictive staircase' of Mr. Bainton showed skill in suggestion of the uncanny, but the joke was too elaborate to be quite successful. The words seemed to call rather for the services of a reciter than for a big choral force and orchestra. 'The death of Admiral Blake' contained some impressive passages, particularly in its first portion. The baritone solo part suggested here and there the hand of the song-writer, and the repetition of words was not always a gain, but apart from these blemishes, Mr. Phillips's setting of Newbolt's fine poem was a convincing piece of work. Mr. Von Holst's new set of Hymns from the 'Rig Veda' proved themselves to be notable additions to the library of male-voice music. The programme also included Vaughan Williams's 'Towards the unknown region'—a fine work which wears well, César Franck's 'Hundredth Psalm,' and Weber's 'Oberon' Overture—somewhat out of the picture. Mr. Charles Knowles sang the solo in 'The death of Admiral Blake,' and also gave an admirable performance of Henschel's 'Young Dietrich.' The New Symphony Orchestra accompanied somewhat unequally, and Mr. Edward Mason conducted.

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The sixth concert of the season at the Queen's Hall on March 16, presented the following programme:

Italian Symphony	Mendelssohn.
Tod und Verklärung	Strauss.
Les Djinns	César Franck.
(Solo Pianoforte, M. CORTOT.)
Dance Poem	Frank Bridge.
Symphonic Variations	César Franck.
(Solo Pianoforte, M. CORTOT.)
Overture 'The Barber of Bagdad'	Cornelius.

Herr Mengelberg conducted. The Symphony was brilliantly played. The outstanding feature of the concert was the splendid and moving performance of the Strauss Tone-poem. The peroration especially was uplifting in the intensity and mood of its interpretation. The César Franck numbers were also finely played by both the Orchestra and M. Cortot. This pianist has now firmly established himself in the favour of our concert audiences. The beauty of Franck's music is rather of a severe order, but there is no mistaking its breadth and power. As to Mr. Frank Bridge's new 'Dance Poem,'—which, as the programme stated, is intended to depict the emotions which a dancer feels in her movements—with great regret we find it impossible to say that it afforded any pleasure. It is bizarre, and both as regards its form and material it is designed apparently to amaze and startle. No doubt this is to be well in the fashion, but all the same the friends of the composer will hope that he will revert to the style in which he has distinguished himself. Mr. Bridge conducted his own piece.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the concert given on February 28 included the oft brilliant and fascinating if at times somewhat over-developed Symphonic-suite 'Scheherazade' by Rimsky-Korsakov. Under Sir Henry Wood's direction it was very finely played. The Brahms Symphony in C minor was another item, and after that came Liszt's Concerto No. 1, in E flat, the solo part of which was admirably performed by Mr. Frederic Lamond. A repetition 'by request' of Stravinsky's freakish Fantasia, 'Fireworks,' completed the programme, which, as a whole, was evidently highly acceptable to the large audience it drew.

The enterprise of the managers of this Orchestra is remarkable. Recently, as we all have reason to remember, the most 'advanced' German composer, Schönberg, was brought over to London to conduct his 'Five Pieces,' and at the concert given on March 14, the equally famous and 'advanced' Russian composer, Scriabin, was imported in order to take part in a performance of his enigmatic work 'Prometheus.' On this occasion the composer himself played the extraordinary pianoforte part, and showed that he possessed fine technique if not great power. Sir Henry Wood conducted the strange and complex music with much skill, being fortified, no doubt, after his experience derived at the first performances (two, at one concert!) last year, and also by the help at interpretation afforded by personal touch with the composer. As to the work itself we give elsewhere a full account (see Mrs. Newmarch's article on p. 227) of its philosophy and musical material. Besides the 'Poem of Fire,' Scriabin's Pianoforte concerto in F sharp minor was performed, the composer again playing the solo part. Here there are no harmonic problems to embarrass the uninitiated. Much of the music makes its immediate appeal to anyone sensitive to beauty. To say that much of it is Chopinesque is to give it praise. A composer capable of writing such fine music in a generally understandable idiom induces a feeling of wonder that in his later emanations he elects to give us psychological puzzles to unravel. Beethoven's eighth Symphony, Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung,' and the 'Meistersinger' Overture were the other and quite welcome features of a great programme.

MR. JULIUS SCHRÖDER'S ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.

This was given with the assistance of the Queen's Hall Orchestra at Queen's Hall on March 9. The chief item was the Symphony in D minor by Christian Sinding. This not very interesting work was first introduced to this country in 1896 by August Manns, at the Crystal Palace. It is difficult to imagine why Mr. Schröder, in view of all that has taken place since that year, thought it worth while to revive a composition that offers so little attraction. There are occasional fine moments, but they are small oases in a desert of exuberant verbosity of noisy sound. The last movement is wearisome: twenty times it seemed to end without finishing. Mr. Schröder showed good capacity as a conductor; perhaps he worked too hard, considering he had before him an Orchestra that needed no whip. Miss Gerhardt sang with fine effect 'Stehe still,' 'Träume,' and 'Schmerzen' by Wagner, and 'Morgen,' 'Wiegenlied,' and 'Cécilie' by Richard Strauss, all with orchestra. The 'Egmont' Overture, the 'Unfinished' B minor symphony, and 'Die Meistersinger' Overture were the other items of the programme.

The Festival of the London Sunday School Choirs at the Albert Hall on February 21 was, as usual, an impressive occasion. About 1,000 voices sang under the direction of Mr. William Whiteman, and under such conditions the interpretations of Somerville's 'God sends the night' and Gounod's 'O saving Victim' were conspicuously effective. Accompaniments were played by an orchestra, which also performed independently under Mr. Wesley Hammet.

The Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society gave selections from 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin' at their concert on February 21. Under Mr. Allen Gill's direction, particular significance was imparted to the comparatively small section of the music that fell to the choir to interpret. The solo-singers were Miss Edith Evans, Miss Bettina Freeman, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Herbert Heyner. On March 21, when the Society gave Bach's Mass in B minor, it was gratifying to see a large audience present, as it showed that the fine work of Mr. Gill and his forces is bearing fruit in the education of the public taste. The performance was fully worthy of the traditions of the Society. Miss Emily Shepherd, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Joseph Farrington were the soloists.

The Orchestral Concerts for Young People continue a successful course under the direction of Miss Gwynne Kimpton. At Æolian Hall on February 21, the chief work heard was Beethoven's Septet in E flat, Op. 20, for wind and strings, the chief points of which had previously been explained by Mr. Gilbert Webb, the lecturer. On March 7, when the concert was given at the Duke's Hall, the lecturer was Mr. Stewart Macpherson, who prepared the way for appreciation of Schumann's first Symphony. Haydn's D major Violoncello concerto was played by Señor Pablo Casals, and songs were given by Miss Winifred Bowden-Smith.

The season of Bach Chamber Concerts at Westminster Cathedral Hall came to an end on February 24, when Dr. Terry conducted a highly creditable performance of the Magnificat in D. The Cathedral Choir sang with efficiency and good spirit, and capable work was done by the soloists, Mrs. Lathrop, Miss Sybil Cropper, Mr. Stuart Wilson, and Mr. Langley. Additional works in the programme were the double-chorus, 'Nun ist das Heil,' and the E major Concerto for pianoforte and strings, played by Mr. Claude Biggs.

At Queen's (Small) Hall on February 25 the Loreley Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Stephen M. Lumsden, gave a concert that included a performance of Rossini's 'Stabat Mater.' An interesting feature was the introduction by Mr. Graeme Brown of the bass flute, an instrument that won immediate approval, both by its tone and by its practical qualities.

The concert given by Herr Bronislaw Huberman at Queen's Hall on February 27 brought under notice a new conductor, Herr Carl Schuricht, who directed a performance of Brahms's first Symphony by the London Symphony Orchestra. Both in this and in the accompaniment to Herr Huberman's interpretations of the Violin concertos of Beethoven and Mendelssohn he showed decided capacity and individuality.

The great concert given at the Albert Hall on the evening of February 28, in aid of the Railway Benevolent Institution, may be described as a unique event. The presence of The King and Queen, The Prince of Wales, Princess Mary, Prince Albert and Prince George, lent dignity and social brilliance to the occasion, and distinction of an opposite character was imparted by a suffragette interruption. A choir of over 700 railwaymen sang under the direction of Mr. W. J. Galloway, the chief number being, appropriately, Mr. Hubert Bath's 'Men on the line.' Part-songs were also in the programme, and an orchestra of 180, besides playing accompaniments, gave the 'Meistersinger' Overture and other works. The solo artists who appeared were Miss Ruth Vincent, Madame Kirkby Lunn, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Walter Kingsley.

At the Duke's Hall, on March 5, Mr. W. Woltmann's Ladies' Orchestra gave a concert with Mozart's 'Kleine Nachtmusik,' Arensky's 'Variations on a theme by Tchaikovsky,' and Bach's Concerto for pianoforte (Miss E. Livens), flute (Mr. A. Fransella), violin (Miss Florence Moss) and strings, as the chief features of the programme. A Prelude and fugue for strings by Moszkowski was heard here for the first time.

The concert given by Mr. Smallwood Metcalfe's Choir at Queen's Hall on March 11 introduced two new choral songs—Mr. Ernest Austin's 'Springtime Fairy' and Mr. Josef Holbrooke's 'To thee, Wales.' Madrigals were, as usual, included in the programme.

The concert of the Patron's Fund at Æolian Hall on March 16 was of miscellaneous character. The artists were Miss Lilian Burgiss, Miss Lillian Grace, Miss Katie Lidbetter, Mr. Darrell Fancourt (vocalists), Miss Annie Godfrey (violin), Miss Thelma Bentwich (violoncello), and Mr. Vivian Langrish and Mr. Ernest Austin (pianoforte). Mr. Austin gave the first performance of his Seven poems for pianoforte.

The first of a series of concerts given by Mr. F. B. Ellis took place at Queen's Hall on March 20. Mr. Geoffrey Toye and Mr. Ellis conducted the Queen's Hall Orchestra in a programme that included Arnold Bax's 'Festival' Overture and 'Four Orchestral sketches' (first complete performance), G. Butterworth's Rhapsody, 'A Shropshire lad' (produced at the last Leeds Festival) and Idyll; 'The bank of green willow' (first performance), and Strauss's 'Don Quixote.' Songs were given by Miss Gladys Moger. We regret that space is not available for full consideration of these works and their performance. Mr. Toye revealed conspicuous ability as a conductor.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Schönberg's Sextet was repeated at the concert given by the London String Quartet at Bechstein Hall on February 20. It was again performed, by the same artists, at the Leighton House chamber concert on March 19.

At the last 'Twelve o'clock' concert of the season, which took place at Æolian Hall on February 26, the 'Tudor Singers,' a mixed-voice quartet, made a good impression. Miss Adela Verne and the London String Quartet gave the first performance of a Phantasy pianoforte quartet by Mrs. Verne-Bredt.

The first of Mr. Holbrooke's series of concerts took place at the Arts Centre on February 27 with considerable success, although the new British music—pianoforte works by Mr. Frederick Kitchener and Mr. Edward Mitchell (who played them)—did not create a sensation. Far more interesting were Mr. Holbrooke's own compositions, a Quintet for clarinet and strings and a Pianoforte quartet, played by Messrs. Charles Draper, John Saunders, Charles Woodhouse, Lionel Tertis, and Herbert Withers.

The programme of the London Trio's concert at Æolian Hall on March 2 included Dvorák's 'Dumky' Trio and Mr. Frank Bridge's Phantasie-Trio, both exceedingly well played. The soloists of the evening were Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, the violoncellist of the Trio, and Miss Nina Rose.

The Brussels Quartet, as usual, aroused great enthusiasm with their playing at Bechstein Hall, on March 3. They were heard in works by Haydn (in C, Op. 54, No. 2), Beethoven (in F minor, Op. 95), and Borodin (in D, No. 2). This quartet party appeared at the Leighton House Chamber Concert of March 5.

The concerts of the Classical Society at Bechstein Hall have followed the usual policy, and retain their deservedly high place in public esteem. On February 4, the programme was supplied by Miss Fannie Davies (pianoforte), Mr. Maurice Sons (violin), Mr. C. Warwick Evans (violoncello), and Dr. Georg Henschel. At the second concert, on March 11, Miss Jelly von Aranyi (violin), Señor Casals (violoncello), and Mr. F. S. Kelly played admirably, both in combination and separately. On March 18, Debussy's Quartet was played by the Gelooso Quartet, and songs were given by Mr. J. Campbell McInnes.

The Fresh Air Art Society gave an interesting concert on March 5 at Æolian Hall. Beethoven's early Serenade for string trio was played by Miss Daisy Kennedy (violin), Mr. Nandor Zsolt (viola), and Mr. Percy Such (violoncello). Mr. Such was associated with M. Benno Moiseivitch (pianoforte) in Dohnányi's Sonata, Op. 8. Mr. Vernon Warner gave a pianoforte solo, and Miss Kennedy and Mr. John Powell played the latter's new Sonata for violin and pianoforte.

A new Pianoforte quartet by Sir Charles Stanford was played at Bechstein Hall on March 14 by Miss Johanne Stockmarr and members of the Wessely Quartet; both in significance and quality it proved worthy of the composer's high reputation as a writer of chamber music. Quartets by Haydn and Dvorák completed the programme.

At Steinway Hall, on March 19, Mr. Mario Lorenzi made the experiment, partially successful, of substituting harp for pianoforte in a Trio by Beethoven and a Quartet by Mozart.

VOCAL RECITALS.

Mlle. Ilona K. Durigo made her first appearance in England at Bechstein Hall on February 24, and displayed a mezzo-soprano voice of exceptional beauty. Schumann's 'Frauenliebe und Leben' Cycle was sung admirably by Madame Lula Myszy-Gmeiner at the same Hall on February 25.

Mr. Plunket Greene gave one of his all too rare song recitals at Æolian Hall on March 5, and again held his audience enthralled with the intensity of his expression. The programme was of the familiar and welcome type—German Lieder and modern English songs, all of the best. Mr. S. Liddle accompanied.

Miss Dorothea Crompton's attractive recital at Bechstein Hall on March 10 gained in interest from the promising singing of the 'Templars' Quartet of mixed voices.

Miss Elena Gerhardt was at her best on March 12 at Bechstein Hall. She sang six songs by Brahms, two by Richard Strauss, four by Hugo Wolf, four by Tchaikovsky, and two by Rubinstein. The audience was repeatedly roused to enthusiasm, and with her customary amiability, Miss Gerhardt responded by giving many encores. One doubted whether it was fair and considerate for an audience to demand so much of an artist. Miss Paula Hegner was a charming accompanist; especially did she show her skill in the Wolf songs.

A group of songs by Madame Poldovski provided one of the attractions of Mr. Murray Davey's vocal recital at Æolian Hall on March 18.

Miss Fanny Copeland included songs by Julius Harrison and two by Schönberg in her programme at Bechstein Hall on March 14.

Vocal recitals were also given by Miss Meta Dieste (Steinway Hall, February 26), Miss Madge Newell (Æolian Hall, March 6), Miss Marjorie Moore (Prince's Room, Criterion Restaurant, March 10), Madame Le Grand Reed (Bechstein Hall, March 17), Miss Evelyn Althaus (Bechstein Hall, March 20), Miss Arnoldie Stephenson (Æolian Hall, March 20), Miss Kathleen Silva (Steinway Hall, March 21).

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

Miss Elsie Horne, one of those pianists who uphold the standard of British musical art, gave an interesting recital at Queen's (Small) Hall on February 21. Miss Jetty Ingenius, a Dutch pianist, played a number of her compatriots' works at Steinway Hall on February 24, a group of pieces by Von Brücken Fock being conspicuous. In company with Miss Ingenius Herr Engelbert Röntgen played two Sonatas for violoncello and pianoforte by Julius Röntgen.

Two recitals, characteristically attractive in every way, were given by Mr. Leonard Borwick at Æolian Hall on February 25 and 27. At the first he repeated his clever transcriptions of Debussy's 'Fêtes' and 'L'après-midi d'un Faune,' at the second he played Ravel's 'Gaspard de la nuit.'

Virtuoso brilliance was as usual the foremost quality in M. Egon Petri's playing at Bechstein Hall on February 27. It characterized also the pianoforte-playing of M. Benno Moiseivitch, whose programme at the same Hall on March 7 included a long, elaborate, and somewhat laboured Sonata, 'Teutonica,' by Mr. John Powell. At a second recital on March 11 M. Petri played the Six elegies of Busoni. At Bechstein Hall on March 17 Mr. Howard-Jones brought his great abilities to bear upon a programme that was severe both in the hearing and in the performing.

The first of two pianoforte recitals of M. Alexander Scriabin took place at Bechstein Hall on Friday, March 20. The programme included eight Preludes from Op. 11 and other early works, the Sonata in F sharp minor, and a group of pieces from Opp. 51, 57, 63, and 59. Both as composer and pianist M. Scriabin enjoyed the completest of triumphs. There were a very large audience and many recalls.

Pianoforte recitals were also given by Miss Olive Byrne (Bechstein Hall, February 20 and 28), Mr. Vivian Langrish (Bechstein Hall, February 24), Miss Katherine Doubleday (Bechstein Hall, February 26), Miss Ada St. John Wright (Duke's Hall, March 2, with the New Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Landon Ronald), Miss Tora Hwass (Steinway Hall, March 18), Mr. Arthur M. Reeves (Queen's (Small) Hall, March 18), Mlle. Spravka and Miss Frances Klein (Bechstein Hall, March 19), Mr. F. S. Kelly (Æolian Hall, March 19), Miss Dorothy Moggridge (Æolian Hall, March 21).

OTHER RECITALS AND CONCERTS.

An exceptionally enjoyable recital was given at Bechstein Hall on February 21 by Miss Lucy Polgreen (pianoforte) and Mr. Thomas Fussell (violin). The artists were heard separately in solos, and together in the performance of Sonatas by Strauss and Lekeu.

A joint-recital was given at Steinway Hall on February 24, by M. Parlovitz (pianoforte), Signor Antonio de Grassi (violin), and Miss Alys Bateman (vocalist), each of whom confirmed a good artistic reputation. On February 28, Miss Marguerite Melville (pianist), and Madame Siegfried Martini (vocalist) gave a joint recital.

On March 5, M. de Groot gave a light Matinée Musicale at Æolian Hall with his own violin-playing, Miss Grace de la Rue's singing, and the performance of music for pianoforte and string sextet, as the principal features. M. Melsa (violin), Miss Kathleen Silva (vocalist), and Fräulein Dalnoky (pianoforte) were heard at Steinway Hall on March 21. A recital was given on the same day at Bechstein Hall by Miss Marian Jay (violin) and Miss Ada Thomas (pianoforte).

The concert given by Mr. Franz Liebich at Æolian Hall on March 11, drew attention to the music of Béla Bartók and Zoltán Kodály, two 'nationalistic' Hungarian composers. Their songs and pianoforte pieces showed that a national idiom and free modern treatment can unite with excellent results. Music of Debussy and Ravel helped to make up an attractive programme. The artists were Miss May Coleman (vocalist), Mr. Leo Dawes (clarinet), Mr. Livio Boni (violoncello), and Mr. Liebich (pianoforte).

Violin recitals were given by Mr. Albert Spalding (Bechstein Hall, March 2); Mr. Fery Weltman (Queen's (Small) Hall, March 10); Mr. Sascha Culbertson (Bechstein Hall, March 16), who played Max Reger's unaccompanied Sonata in B flat major; Mr. Philip Levine (Bechstein Hall, March 18).

STUDENT CONCERTS.

Brahms's 'Requiem' was performed at Trinity College of Music on February 24, under the direction of Dr. Henry T. Pringuer. The soloists were Miss Lilian Barnett and Mr. Roberts, and the accompaniment was provided by Mr. Harry Gray (organ) and Mrs. J. R. Blazey (pianoforte).

A great number of pupils took part in the chamber concert given by the Royal Academy of Music at the Duke's Hall on March 11. The chief concerted number was a movement from Brahms's Sextet in B flat. Works by Gilbert Bolton and Herbert Haworth were introduced.

The chamber concert of the Royal College of Music given on March 13 was especially notable in that Schönberg's now well-known Sextet was played by students. The same programme included Mendelssohn's Octet.

Suburban Concerts.

The Ealing Philharmonic Society gave an attractive concert on February 14, the programme of which was drawn entirely from the works of Sir Arthur Sullivan, sacred and secular, grave and gay. It proved to be one of the most successful in the history of the Society, and under Mr. E. Victor Williams's conductorship both choir and orchestra distinguished themselves by many artistic interpretations. Solo parts were admirably sustained by Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Mildred Evans, Mr. Sydney Coltham, and Mr. Joseph Farrington.

A concert was given by the String Orchestra of the Croydon Conservatoire of Music in the large Public Hall, on February 20. Mr. W. H. Reed was the conductor, and the programme comprised Overture 'Sirse,' Handel; Serenade, Op. 20, Elgar; Mozart's Symphony No. 29 in A major; and Vivaldi's Concerto for violin in A minor. The solo part of the latter work was played by Miss Edna Baher.

The programme chosen by the Dulwich Philharmonic Society for performance at the Crystal Palace on February 21 included Stanford's 'Phaudrig Crohoore,' C. H. Lloyd's eight-part song for female voices, 'The rosy dawn,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' all of which were effectively interpreted under the direction of Mr. Martin Klickmann. The soloists were Miss Lilian Dillingham, Miss Gladys Palmer, Mr. J. S. Perry, and Mr. Dawson Freer.

A highly successful concert was given at the Ewen Hall, Barnet, on February 24, by Miss Emily Macfarlane, whose ladies' choir and string orchestra provided an attractive miscellaneous programme. The part-songs included Ireland's 'There is a garden in her face,' German's 'Beauteous morn,' and Elgar's 'The snow,' and as the concluding number, Bishop's 'Now tramp o'er moss and fell,' in which Miss Macfarlane took the solo part. The instrumental numbers included Parry's 'Lady Radnor' Suite. Miss Marjorie Hayward (violin) and Miss Evelyn Malcolm Cook (pianoforte) played concerto movements, and Mr. Thorpe Bates gave a number of songs. Miss Macfarlane was conductor-in-chief.

Exceptional success in every way attended the concert of the South-West Choral Society at Battersea Town Hall on March 4, when Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and the concert-selection from Gounod's 'Faust' were given with excellent effect under the direction of Mr. Arthur R. Saunders. The solo parts were taken by Miss Mary Leighton, Miss May Peters, Mr. Richard Ripley, and Mr. George Baker.

'The Dream of Gerontius' was performed by the People's Palace Choral and Orchestral Societies under the direction of Mr. Frank Idle on March 7, to a very large and attentive audience. The choral-singing was notable for its intelligence and enthusiasm, and the singers merited high praise for the way in which they overcame the technical difficulties of the work. Comment upon Mr. Gervase Elwes's singing of the tenor music is superfluous. Miss Maud Wright sang the music allotted to the 'Angel' very tenderly, and Mr. Arthur Rose gave a broad and impressive reading of the part of the Priest and the 'Angel of the Agony.' The orchestral accompaniments were well played under the leadership of Mr. George Wilby, and Mr. Herbert Hodge was at the organ.

The Bermondsey Settlement Choral and Orchestral Union, a body that has done much for music in South-East London, gave a performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion music at Great Central Hall on March 12, under the direction of Mr. E. Stanley Roper. The soloists were Miss Mary Leighton, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Joseph Reed, Mr. Stewart Gardner, and Mr. Lewis John.

The 'Robert Browning Guild (1914),' founded by Mr. Sivori Levey in January of this year, after an initiatory session at 28, Charing Cross Road, will hold its meetings on and from April 2 at the new Robert Browning Guild Theatre, 31, Alfred Place, Bedford Square.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society's third concert of the current series was given in the Town Hall on February 19, under the excellent direction of Dr. Sinclair, who, since he became the conductor of the Society, has considerably raised the artistic standard of choral singing at Birmingham. The programme consisted of Beethoven's colossal Mass in D and Goring Thomas's Cantata, 'The swan and the skylark,' originally produced at our Triennial Musical Festival in 1894, a year and a-half after the composer's tragic death. That our premier Choral Society are thoroughly equipped for such a performance as Beethoven's great Mass, and are capable of mastering its enormous difficulties, has been amply proved on various previous occasions, and once more they carried off the honours of a truly majestic interpretation, glorious in sustaining tone-power, in rhythm and accentuation, admirably supported by the fine playing of the orchestra and Mr. C. W. Perkins's judicious help at the organ. The quartet of principals were Madame Elsa Oswald, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Frank J. Webster, and Mr. Hamilton Harris.

The Midland Musical Society gave a performance of Berlioz's dramatic legend 'Faust' at the Town Hall on February 28. Mr. A. J. Cotton, the conductor, had evidently taken much care in its preparation, the outcome being a distinctly creditable exposition of such a master-work, both choir and orchestra quite distinguishing themselves. The committee were fortunate in their principals, who included Miss Eva Rich, Mr. John Booth, Mr. A. H. Cranmer, and Mr. Sidney Stoddard.

The last Harrison Concert of the season was held in the Town Hall on March 2, which was crowded to overflowing. It was entirely orchestral, the executive being the London Symphony Orchestra, and the conductor Herr Arthur Nikisch. The programme included Brahms's first Symphony in C minor, Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and Debussy's Prelude 'L'après-midi d'un Faune.'

Our well-known local pianist, Mr. Arthur Cooke, gave a pianoforte recital in the large lecture theatre of the Birmingham and Midland Institute on February 28, the programme which was in three sections being devoted to 'Old English,' 'American,' and 'Modern English' music. A pianoforte recital was also given by Miss Florence Thomas at the Queen's College on March 4.

The combined choirs, the Birmingham Ladies' Choir and the Johnson Peters Choir, trained and conducted by Mr. Johnson Peters, gave a concert in the Town Hall on March 7, the programme containing some excellent part-songs. One of the chief items, however, was Brahms's 'Alto Rhapsody,' excellently sung by Miss Eva Brookes, and admirably supported by the male-voice choir. Violin solos were given by Mr. William Henley.

The Birmingham Choral Union, for their last concert of the season, given in the Town Hall on March 14, adopted a programme much too long for a popular Saturday night concert. The Choral works comprised Handel's 'Dettingen Te Deum' and Bach's early Church cantata, 'God's time is the best.' The Society is making great advance under the painstaking training and conductorship of Mr. Richard Wassell, the choristers improving in vocal technique and artistic tendency each time one hears them. A number of part-songs were delightfully performed by Mr. Wassell's Male-Voice Choir, and the orchestra achieved quite a success with Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony. The principals were Miss Olive Pank, Mr. Wilfred Hudson, and Mr. Charles Knowles. Miss Lilian Green also contributed to the programme, giving a charming performance of Bishop's 'Lo, here the gentle lark.'

BOURNEMOUTH.

Among the works brought forward at the twentieth to the twenty-third Symphony Concerts two British compositions deserve particular mention—Six variations and an epilogue on 'Down among the dead men,' a clever work by Julius Harrison (the first performance here, skilfully conducted by the composer), and Balfour Gardiner's merry and bustling 'Overture to a comedy.' At the twenty-first concert a contingent of ladies from the Municipal Choir participated in the first performance at Bournemouth of Liszt's 'Dante' Symphony, but the shortcomings of the work, in spite of a good all-round interpretation, were very apparent. The soloists have not been of a consistently uniform excellence, but all have contributed in varying degrees to the interest of the proceedings: those appearing at the most recent concerts have been Miss May Mukle (violoncello), and Mr. Percy Sharman (in Brahms's Concerto for violin and violoncello), Miss Tina Lerner (pianoforte), Mr. Lionel Falkman (violin), and Miss Elsie Walker (pianoforte).

As the source of programmes containing much originality and inventive planning the Monday 'Pops' more than hold their own amid the plethora of musical events. The following chief details afford some idea of the novel features introduced: February 23, 'The evolution of the Overture,' opera, oratorio, and drama: Gluck's 'Alceste,' 1767, to Humperdinck's 'Die Königskinder,' 1897. March 2, Scandinavian music: Svendsen's 'Carnival in Paris'; Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite, No. 1; Halvorsen's 'Vasantasena' Suite. March 9, Musical portraits of famous characters: Liszt's Symphonic-poem, 'Mazeppa'; William Wallace's Symphonic-poem, 'Villon'; Enna's Overture, 'Hans C. Andersen.'

Quite as attractive in their appeal to all shades of opinion have been the miscellaneous concerts. Most pleasurable anticipations were aroused, for instance, by the announcement of the appearance on February 17 of M. Florent Schmitt, the eminent French composer, with the famous Parisian Quartet; on the following day a fine programme of Russian music, wherein the orchestral element was conspicuous, was provided by Miss Alys Bateman (vocalist) and Mr. Edouard Parlovitz (pianoforte). Mr. Percy Grainger's visits always ensure an abundance of high spirits and good humour, his orchestral concert on February 21 being no exception to the rule. A sacred orchestral concert on Ash Wednesday proved a conventional affair enough, but Madame Ada Crossley and Mr. Ernest Pike pleased the audience with their vocal contributions. Miss Tina Lerner gave a pianoforte recital two days later, with an attractive programme. A Wagner-Tchaikovsky concert on March 4 proved very acceptable; the soloists were Miss Dora Gibson and Mr. Herbert Heyner. Mr. and the Hon. Mrs. Julian Clifford gave an orchestral concert on March 7. 'The finest ever heard at Bournemouth,' was the unanimous verdict passed upon the performance of 'The Messiah' on March 10. Mr. Godfrey got every ounce out of his choir, the latter singing with an hitherto unsuspected and certainly unrevealed vitality and unanimity of purpose. Dr. Holloway, the chorus-master, must be credited with the excellent grounding of his singers. The soloists were Miss Emily Breare, Miss Lucy Nuttall, Mr. Joseph Cheetham, and Mr. Robert Radford.

Last, but not least, attention should be drawn to Miss Elena Gerhardt's recital on March 16, for this consummate artist is an example to all Lieder singers.

BRISTOL.

There was a large attendance at Colston Hall on February 19, when the Ladies' Night of the Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society was held. The choir gave the following works, for the first time at their annual concert: 'At Summer's eve' (T. F. Walmisley), 'It's oh! to be a wild wind' (Elgar), 'The sailor's return' (Percy E. Fletcher), 'Early one morning' (T. F. Dunhill), and 'Orpheus' (Parry). There were ninety vocalists, Mr. Donald Reid and Mr. F. Mullings being engaged as soloists. Mr. George Riseley directed the performance with ability, and the audience fully appreciated the admirable singing.

The Clifton Quintet held their third concert of the season at the Victoria Rooms on February 23, and their efforts afforded pleasure to a large number of persons. The scheme embraced Schubert's Quintet in C (Op. 163), Gabriel Fauré's Quartet in C minor (Op. 15), and York Bowen's Sonata in F for viola and pianoforte, excellently played by Messrs. Alfred Best and Herbert Parsons.

On February 28 Bristol Choral Society gave a fine performance of 'Elijah' at Colston Hall, before an immense audience. The soloists were Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Charles Knowles. Mr. George Riseley conducted with his accustomed judgment.

Avonmouth and Shirehampton Choral Society on March 6 gave a performance of 'The Creation,' in St. Andrew's Church, Avonmouth, under the direction of Mr. W. Powell. The soloists were Miss Elizabeth Morgan, Mr. Charles Goulding, and Mr. Lionel Dore.

There was a concert given by the Cecilian Choral Society (employees of Messrs. J. S. Fry & Sons, Ltd.) on March 7 at the Victoria Rooms. Mr. Charles Read was the conductor, and Mr. Maurice Alexander led the band. The programme comprised Hubert Bath's 'The wedding of Shon Maclean' and a miscellaneous selection. Miss Joan Dalrymple and Mr. Herbert Tracey were the principal vocalists. The performance gave much pleasure to a large audience.

On March 9 Mr. Hubert Hunt gave his twelfth chamber concert at the Victoria Rooms, the players being Mr. Hunt and Miss Avice Sealy (violin), Miss Gladys Home and Miss Hilda Bass (viola), Mr. Roger Bucknall and Miss Rosa Button (violoncello), and Miss Jenny Meid (pianoforte). The programme illustrated Brahms at different periods.

There was a fine performance of Gounod's 'Redemption' by Bristol Musical Society on March 14 at the Victoria Rooms, under the direction of Mr. C. W. Stear.

Mr. Hubert Hunt interested a large audience at the Victoria Rooms on March 18, when he gave a violin recital.

CAMBRIDGE.

The University Musical Society's chamber concerts have been more than usually successful during the past season. In the Michaelmas term a concert was given by the Rosé Quartet, the programme including Beethoven's Quartet in F major, Op. 135. On November 12 Mrs. Harry Bedford and Mr. Egon Petri gave a concert. Mr. Petri played Busoni's 'Berceuse' and first Sonata. On December 3 Fräulein Elena Gerhardt gave a recital of German songs ranging from Schubert to Richard Strauss. Three concerts have been given during the Lent term. On January 21 the London String Quartet gave works by Glazounov, Ravel, and Dvorák. A concert of chamber music for harp, flute, clarinet, and string quartet aroused great interest, Ravel's notable 'Prelude and Allegro' being part of the programme. On March 4 the Brussels Quartet played Tchaikovsky's Quartet in E flat, Op. 50, the Allegro in C minor from Schubert's Unfinished Quartet, and Beethoven's Quartet in C major, Op. 59, No. 3.

At the end of the Michaelmas term a Symphony concert was given by the University Musical Society's Orchestra. The programme consisted of Bach's fourth 'Brandenburg' Concerto in G major, the continuo being played upon the harpsichord, Beethoven's third Symphony, and Brahms's Violin concerto. The orchestra gave us an astonishingly able performance of these well-known classics, and their playing was full of life and enthusiasm. Dr. Rootham is to be congratulated that such a concert as this compares most favourably with any professional orchestral concert given at Cambridge during the past few years.

On February 14 Bach's Mass in B minor was performed by the choir and orchestra before a very large audience. The soloists were Miss Edith McCullagh, Miss Sara Silvers, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. William Higley. The choir sang with great enthusiasm, and fully justified the undertaking of this wonderful work. The performance must have represented a great deal of persevering labour on the part of the conductor and performers.

An important event outside the doings of the Society was Dr. Naylor's production on the concert-platform of his own Opera, 'The Angelus,' together with parts of Beethoven's 'Fidelio,' including the Finale. The performance took place on March 5, under the composer's direction. There can be no doubt that Dr. Naylor's work appeals directly and successfully to the public, as the enthusiasm of the audience testified. There is a great deal of natural and beautiful melody, and some wonderfully stirring and effective moments. The orchestration throughout the work is on the lavish scale of Wagner, and the choruses are effective. Miss Eveline Matthews sang the parts of Beatrice and Sylvia with charm and expression, but they seemed sometimes uncomfortably high for her. Mr. Mullings was effective as Francis. Mr. Robert Radford, the bass, was exceedingly good, his interpretation being both dignified and impressive. All the soloists were excellent in the selections from 'Fidelio,' and the singing of the choir showed careful training.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

The choir of St. Simon's Church, on February 4, with some outside assistance, gave a miscellaneous concert under the direction of Mr. W. G. Nelder, and afforded proof of their success in non-ecclesiastical part-songs, including 'The goslings' and 'O peaceful night.' In the new Cathedral Hall the Roman Catholic Philharmonic Society made an appearance on February 23, under the baton of Mr. Albert Doyle. It is depressing to find that this Society, which in numbers not far off two hundred formerly gave promise of fine and important choral work, has decreased to less than fifty. Those who now constitute the Society still uphold its honour, for they sang remarkably well Hurlstone's ballad, 'Alfred the Great,' and Gade's 'Spring's message,' precision of rhythm and intonation being noticeable features. The choir of King Street Wesleyan Sunday School have won many honours in the Sunday School Union through the excellent training of Mr. Harry Woodward, assisted by Mrs. Woodward, and at their annual concert on March 4 their excellent part-singing and expressive interpretation disclosed the reason of their repeated successes. The Three Towns Madrigal Society, formed last autumn for the study, under Dr. Harold Lake, of unaccompanied choral-singing of a classical and modern type, gave their first public performance on March 11. A first appearance is not a fair occasion for criticism, but the singing of the choir showed that the training so far received had been of the right kind, and the tone was musical, refined, and well-controlled. 'How eloquent are eyes' (John E. West), 'Sweet honey-sucking bees' (Wilbye), 'Weary wind of the west' (Elgar), and pieces by Festa, Bishop, and Edwards were sung. Mr. Spencer Dyke (violin) and Miss Mabel Braine (contralto) were the solo artists.

A local amateur, Mrs. R. H. Wagner, set a good example for others to follow by inviting an audience, on March 7, 'to hear music by Plymouth composers.' An excellent programme was produced, the contributors being Dr. Harold Lake (Pianoforte trio and solo, and Quintet for strings and horns); Messrs. David Parkes and Manley Martin (songs); Mr. Walter Weekes (song and viola solo); Miss L. Blight (pianoforte and violin solos); and Mr. Gerald Phillips an Opera, 'Cleopatra,' for three soloists, chorus, pianoforte, and harp. The performers were local professionals and amateurs.

Dr. Weekes's Orchestral Society on February 18 played Borodin's Overture to 'Prince Igor,' under Dr. Weekes's baton, and in the second part of the concert, conducted by Mr. Walter Weekes, the chief number was Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony. A Poem for orchestra, 'Autumn,' was specially composed for the Society (who played it on this date) by Mr. Gerald Phillips; and a specially interesting event was the performance of Rheinberger's Concerto for organ and orchestra, No. 2, in G minor, of which Mr. Lewis G. Sydenham played the solo with artistic instinct, and intellectual insight and technical performance of a very high order. Miss Mary Groser was the vocalist.

Brahms's Pianoforte trio in B was played by Misses Winifred Smith, May Mukle, and Florence Smith, on February 18, at the closing concert for the season of the Misses Smith's Musical Matinees. Mrs. Elsie Swinton was the vocalist.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

The prospectus of the second Torquay Musical Festival, dated for April 15 and 16, provides food for thought in the attention it gives to modern music. Mr. Basil Hindenberg, the Municipal conductor, will augment his orchestra to seventy for the Festival; Messrs. Thomas Beecham, Percy Grainger, and Percy Pitt will complete the party of conductors, and the last-named will provide a new work for performance. Another production will be an Orchestral suite, 'The pool,' by G. H. Clutsam, which is awaited with interest; Strauss will be represented by the closing scene from 'Salome,' and by Tone-poems; the first performance in England will be given of a Symphony (the first) by Stravinsky, Delius, Holbrooke (scene from 'The Children of Don'), Wagner, Debussy, Tchaikovsky, Dvorák, and Bach are also represented. The solo artists will be Miss Carrie Tubb, Mr. Frank Mullings, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. Percy Grainger.

Sir Frederick Bridge visited the Torquay Pavilion on February 18, with his lecture on 'Shakespeare and Music,' to which illustrations were sung by Miss Winifred Lewis, Mr. Alfred Heather, and a small choir directed by Mr. Ernest W. Goss. The Municipal Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Hindenberg, has performed a comprehensive Symphony scheme throughout the season just closing, without additional help. On March 4, the Symphony was Beethoven's No. 2; Miss Tina Lerner collaborated in Grieg's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, and Mr. Julian Clifford conducted an Orchestral ode of his own composition. On March 18 Haydn's Military symphony was played.

Tavistock Male Choir, trained by Mr. W. Clotworthy, gave a good account of themselves on February 23 with madrigals, part-songs, and choruses by Walford Davies, Lee Williams, Maunder, and others. The tenors were particularly fine in tone and technique. Mlle. Fifi de la Côte, Mr. S. J. Bishop, and Rev. T. L. Evans sang solos, and Mr. Percy Lowman played violin pieces. Totnes Choral Society sang 'The Rose Maiden' on February 24, under the direction of Mr. Herbert Worth and with orchestral accompaniment.

CORNWALL.

Of unusual interest was a concert given under the direction of the Rev. Canon Corfe at Truro on February 17, by members of the Cathedral Choir, the selection of madrigals and glees being excellently arranged to represent distinctive periods. John Farmer's 'Fair Phyllis,' an air and chorus from Purcell's music to 'The Tempest,' Morley's ballet, 'Dainty, fine, sweet nymph,' Wilbye's 'Lady, when I behold,' were the earlier types, and Hatton's 'The hemlock tree,' and the glees 'Beneath a green shade' (C. W. Corfe) and 'There is beauty' (Sir John Goss), were early 19th century examples.

Even more than the usual success attended the annual performance on February 18, of the Bodmin Philharmonic Society, which under the direction of Mr. R. R. Glendinning has attained a high standard of choral work. Parts 1 and 2 of 'Hiawatha' were performed with orchestra, the soloists being Miss Doris Montrave and Messrs. Joseph Cheetham and Joseph E. Farrington; the Petroc Quartet sang pieces by Bridge and Abt. Looe Choral Society, an enthusiastic set of workers, gave an excellent performance of the concert-version of Gounod's 'Faust' on February 19, the principals and members of the band being drawn from the district. Dr. Harold Lake conducted. On February 24, pupils of Thelema College, Newquay, gave a concert at which the choral class sang part-songs by Vincent, Coleridge-Taylor, Henry Hodson, Luard-Selby, and C. H. Lloyd. St. Just Choral Society attained a good standard in singing Cowen's 'The Rose Maiden' on March 11, with orchestral accompaniment, and conducted by Mrs. N. T. Williams; and on March 12 Camborne Male Choir sang at Tregajorran.

DUBLIN.

The Royal Dublin Society chamber music recitals finished for the season on March 2, when the Brodsky Quartet, with Mrs. Rawdon Briggs and Miss MacCullagh, gave splendid performances of the two String sextets by Brahms. On the previous Monday, M. Simonetti, Mr. Clyde Twelvetees, and Dr. Esposito played Trios by Mozart and Beethoven (Op. 97), and M. Simonetti and Dr. Esposito played the Brahms Violin sonata in A.

At Woodbrook M. Alfred Cortot made his first appearance on February 21, playing Saint-Saëns's Concerto in C minor, with Dr. Esposito interpreting the orchestral part on a second pianoforte; Chopin's 24 Preludes and a Liszt Rhapsody were also played, and the pianist was warmly received by a large audience. On March 7 Miss Agnes Nicholls, accompanied by Mr. Hamilton Harty, gave a fine programme of songs, including several by Mr. Harty. On March 14 M. Simonetti, Mr. Twelvetees, and Dr. Esposito, with Mr. Percy Whitehead as vocalist, provided the programme, which included Trios by Schubert in B flat and Raff in C minor. The College Choral Society, under Dr. Charles Marchant, gave a performance of Mozart's 'Requiem,' and the solos were sung by members of the Society, who, so far as the programme is concerned, are always nameless. Mozart's E flat Symphony was also in the programme.

On March 18, the Dublin Orchestral Society gave their second concert of the season. The programme included Schumann's 'Genoveva' Overture, Geminiani's Concerto Grosso in C minor, Op. 2, No. 2 (edited by Dr. Esposito), the instrumental portion of Beethoven's ninth Symphony, and Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini.' The Geminiani is especially interesting from the fact that the composer spent a great part of his life at Dublin, where he died in 1762.

The Rev. H. Beverunge, Professor of Music at Maynooth College, has been appointed to the Chair of Music, and Mr. Robert O'Dwyer to the Chair of Irish Music, at the National University of Ireland.

EDINBURGH.

The Classical Concerts were brought to a close by a visit of the Hallé Orchestra under Michael Balling on February 19, 20, and 21. At the first of the three concerts Bruckner's third Symphony received a most impressive interpretation. The 'Helena' Variations of Bantock and Strauss's 'Don Juan' were the other purely orchestral items. At the same concert Siloti made his first appearance at Edinburgh, with orchestra, playing the 'Wanderer-Fantasia' of Schubert-Liszt and the 'Totentanz' of Liszt. On February 20 Madame Durigo, the Hungarian mezzo-soprano, made her first appearance in Great Britain. Coming immediately after the 'strenuous' atmosphere of the preceding night, Mozart and Bach supplied a delightful evening of restful music. Max Reger's 'Concerto in the olden style' did not disturb this classic atmosphere, and was warmly received. On February 21, a memorable performance of 'The Messiah' under ideal conditions took place. It left nothing to be desired. The soloists were Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Doris Woodall, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Robert Radford. Mr. Collinson was at the organ.

The new Usher Hall and organ (by Messrs. Norman & Beard), presented by the late Mr. Andrew Usher at a cost of £134,000, were opened on March 6. The occasion supplied Edinburgh with a series of three concerts on March 6 and 7. Dr. Henschel conducted the two evening concerts. The actual opening ceremony included a performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' with the Royal Choral Union. Miss Osborne, Miss Marie Thomson, and Mr. John Coates were the soloists.

The evening programme included Granville Bantock's 'Highland scenes' for string orchestra. Mr. Kirkhope's Choir (Mr. Kirkhope conducting) performed Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens.' Mr. Robert Burnett sang excellently Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea,' and the orchestra, under Dr. Henschel, gave fine performances of Mackenzie's 'Britannia' Overture, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Wagner's 'Rienzi' Overture.

On March 10, Mr. Kirkhope's Choir, at their own annual concert, performed Brahms's 'Requiem,' with Miss Agnes Nicholls and Mr. Herbert Brown as soloists.

GLASGOW.

This month's record is one of almost wholly local effort. On February 23 the Paisley Ladies' Choir (Mr. F. Boothroyd, conductor) gave a first performance in Scotland of Debussy's 'The Blessed Damsel' (soloists, Miss Jean Waterston and Miss Crue Davidson), which, with an 'Impromptu' by Sibelius, received tasteful treatment by the Choir, supported by an orchestra led by Mr. H. W. Cole. Among other composers represented on the programme were Vaughan Williams, Bantock, and Elgar.

The Glasgow Ladies' String Orchestra, under the able direction of Miss Hilda Bayley, gave a highly successful concert on February 27. The programme included a Concerto Grosso by Handel, a Divertimento by Mozart, and Granville Bantock's Serenade 'In the Far West,' which last was brought to a first hearing at Glasgow. The unanimity and finish of the orchestral playing were such as would have done no discredit to a professional band. Songs given by Signor Lenghi-Cellini varied the instrumental programme.

The annual concert of the University Choral Society under Mr. A. M. Henderson took place on March 2, and one notes with pleasure the improvement that the singing of this body shows from year to year. The programme was irreproachable as to quality and suitability, and the student-choristers carried it through with distinct success. The concert, however, was chiefly notable by reason of the first appearance here of Miss Helen Henschel as solo vocalist. No less interesting was the concert of the Glasgow Gaelic Musical Association on March 6. The programme of Highland songs and harmonized arrangements all sung so simply and feelingly in the Gaelic language made a very strong appeal to the audience. The singing of the part-songs by the choir was refined and expressive, and reflects most creditably on the skill and taste of the conductor, Mr. William Armstrong. On March 5 Mr. Hutton Malcolm's Male-Voice Choir gave their annual concert. The chief merit of the programme was its freshness, for, with the exception of Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet,' the part-songs—chiefly by German composers—were quite unfamiliar. The choral singing was on a high level. The Glasgow Glee and Madrigal Society, under Mr. B. W. Hartley, gave a successful concert on March 10, and in a well-chosen selection of madrigals and part-songs—which included Greaves's 'Come again, sweet love,' Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bee,' Parry's 'Come, pretty wag,' and Elgar's 'Weary wind of the West'—the choir made an excellent appearance.

In some respects the six evenings (March 3 to 19) devoted to the Verbrugghen Quartet (Mr. H. Verbrugghen, Miss J. Cullen, Mr. J. Messeas, and Mr. D. E. Nichols) to chamber music as represented by Beethoven's sixteen String quartets, were the outstanding feature of the month's music. On the first evening Mr. Verbrugghen gave an introductory lecture on the life and general circumstances of the composer during the period in which the Quartets were composed, and a short analysis of and comparison with Beethoven's works in other branches of music. It says little for the general interest in chamber music that Mr. Verbrugghen's excellent scheme received inadequate public support.

Opera has been represented by a fortnight's performances by the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company and by that capable amateur Society, the Orpheus Club. The Abstainers' Union brought their sixtieth season of City Hall Saturday Evening Concerts to a close on February 28. On March 11, under the auspices of the local Theosophical Societies, Mrs. Maud Mann delivered a very thoughtful public lecture on 'Theosophy and the music of the future.'

Special mention should be made of the superb singing of the Glasgow Orpheus Choir (conducted by Mr. H. S. Robertson) at their second concert on March 17, notably in Coleridge-Taylor's 'Dead in the Sierras,' Cornelius's 'The surrender of the soul to the Everlasting Love,' Ernest Walker's 'The splendour falls on castle walls,' and Bantock's unique arrangement of 'The Death Croon.' On March 20 the Teachers' Choral Society again demonstrated continued artistic advance under the able direction of Mr. Harry S. Munro. The chief number on the programme was Coleridge-Taylor's ever-green 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' which, with a judiciously chosen selection of part-songs, was sung with capital effect.

GLOUCESTER.

Great success attended the concert with which the Gloucester Choral Society brought its fifty-third season to a close on Tuesday evening, March 10. A magnificent performance of Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' will cause the occasion to stand out as a very memorable one in the annals of the Society. There were a band and choir of about 180, and a quartet of very competent principals, viz., Madame Alice Phillips, Miss Marion Battishill, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Harry Downing. The work of the choir was deserving of the highest praise. They sang with great beauty and variety of tone, as well as with splendid volume. The 'Stabat Mater' was preceded by two interesting Handel selections.

The Gloucestershire Orchestral Society concluded their thirteenth season with a concert in the Shire Hall on March 19, when the programme submitted was the most ambitious ever attempted, including as it did Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony. Any fears as to the task being beyond the powers of the 150 performers under the command of Dr. A. Herbert Brewer were soon set at rest; the conductor and his forces achieved wonders. In addition there were two other orchestral pieces given, namely, Handel's D minor Concerto for strings (Op. 60, No. 10), and Luigini's 'Suite Russe,' while solo items were contributed by Mr. W. H. Reed (violin), and Miss Marion Beeley (vocalist).

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

At the tenth concert of the Philharmonic Society on February 24, M. Alfred Cortot gave an exhibition of his brilliant and masterly pianoforte playing in Beethoven's seldom-heard first Concerto in C, and in César Franck's Symphonic Variations. Another welcome visitor was Madame Lula Myscz-Gmeiner, the well-known Lieder singer. The orchestral features of the programme included the 'Leonora' No. 3 Overture and Dvorák's Symphony in G, which Sir Frederic Cowen conducted. His musicianly setting of Keats's sonnet 'Bring me a golden pen' was well sung by the choir.

Conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald, to whom the work is inscribed, the first performance at Liverpool of Sir Edward Elgar's new Symphonic-study, 'Falstaff,' made the eleventh Philharmonic concert of March 10 exceptionally noticeable. The work certainly made a favourable impression on a keenly-interested audience. As descriptive music on a programme-basis, the felicity of its themes, the ingenuity and variety of their treatment, and the mastery of the orchestration are manifest even on a first hearing. It is Elgar at his best, and he has surely achieved nothing finer in conception and workmanship. In 'Falstaff,' the pictures are so rapidly successive and separately complete that perhaps it may be open to question whether the music is homogeneous as a whole. It is certainly brilliant and vivacious, with a touch of sadness blended in its descriptive humour. The little 'dream picture' of 'what might have been' is a luxury of sentiment which the rare beauty of the music excuses. A deeper note of actuality is found in the death scene and final moments of this splendidly powerful work which is so characteristic in its originality and individuality. Other features of the concert included the new arrangement by Mr. Ronald of Bizet's first Suite, 'L'Arlesienne,' and Stanford's choral song, 'The Last Post,' which was conducted by Mr. Harry Evans in accordance with the recent wise decision that the resident chorus-master who prepares the choral music should himself direct its public performance. Miss Muriel Foster was heard to more advantage in singing three of Elgar's 'Sea pictures' than in a gloomy and protracted scena from Max Bruch's 'Achilleus.'

A crowded audience attended the annual concert given by Madame De Bouffiers in the Philharmonic Hall on March 11, when her Ladies' Choir, assisted by the Liverpool Vocal Union of male voices, sang Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' with excellent effect, the choir and band being ably conducted by the lady concert-giver. The vocal principals were Miss Beatrice Miranda, Miss K. Wylie, Signor Piero Gherardi, and Mr. Hebden Foster. It is interesting to relate that the tenor was personally known to Rossini at Paris, and sang as a choir-boy at the famous composer's funeral.

The annual concert of the University of Liverpool Musical Society, held in the Institute Hall, Mount Street, on March 14, was chiefly devoted to a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' which was conducted by Mr. Harry Evans. The vocal principals were Miss Gwladys Roberts, Miss Frances Lucas, and Mr. Anderson.

Another interesting choral function was the annual concert of the Cymric Vocal Union on March 7, when this excellent organization of male voices, conducted by Mr. J. T. Jones, sustained the high reputation they have gained during a long career of thirty years.

Dr. E. Markham Lee lectured at the Royal Institution on February 21, before the local section of the I.S.M., on Tchaikovsky. Those wanting to refer to Tchaikovsky's works in the British Museum were recommended to look under the letter C. The lecturer was assisted instrumentally by the Misses L., M., and H. McCullagh.

The sixth and closing concert of the Vasco-Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra season occurred on February 17, when this fine combination of seventy players successfully carried through a programme which included the 'Pathetic' Symphony and '1812' Overture, as well as a Gluck Suite, 'Paris and Helena,' and a less valuable novelty, Mandl's 'Hymn to the rising sun.' The vocal contributions by Miss Carrie Tubb deservedly found favour.

In place of the usual ballad concert which Mr. Percy Harrison provides, the engagement of the London Symphony Orchestra (conducted by Herr Arthur Nikisch) was an equally potent attraction for the fourth concert on March 4. Equally memorable were performances of such dissimilar pieces as 'Till Eulenspiegel' and 'L'après-midi d'un Faune,' and Brahms's first Symphony. At the fourth and final concert of the Brodsky Quartet, on March 14, an interesting Quartet by Novacek was played for the first time here. An animated performance was also given of Schumann's Pianoforte quintet, in which Mr. Charles Kelly played admirably. Another first-rate String quartet (Mr. Arthur Catterall's) sustained the music at the ninth evening of the Rodewald Concert Club on February 23. At the tenth and final meeting of the Club on March 9 the music was provided by Miss Lena Kontorovitch, a violinist of great ability, and Mr. Charles Kelly as pianist. Other chamber concerts included that given by Mr. Arthur Catterall, Mr. Ernest Wright (violinello), and Mr. Stanley Prescott (pianoforte), (the Prescott Trio) on March 11.

A pianoforte and 'cello recital was given on February 19 by two skilled players, Mr. Frank Bertrand and Mr. Van Damme, and on February 20 Mr. Josef Greene, one of our most able younger pianists, introduced Glazounov's Pianoforte sonata No. 1, Op. 74, and Miss Gladys Lederer, an accomplished mezzo-soprano, was agreeably heard in contrasted groups of Lieder.

By means of an orchestral concert held in the Public Hall, West Kirby, on February 27, Mr. Adrian C. Boulton, an Oxford B.A. and Mus. Bac. and a pupil of Arthur Nikisch, made a promising début as an orchestral conductor. The programme included Bach's 'Brandenburg Concerto' No. 2, in F, Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll,' Hugo Wolf's 'Italian Serenade,' Mozart's 'Don Juan' Overture, and a melodious and suggestively-scored little Idyll for small orchestra, 'The banks of green willow,' by George Butterworth. Two movements of Schumann's Pianoforte concerto were played by Dr. W. B. Brierley with musicianly and unobtrusive skill. Miss Agnes Nicholls contributed a powerful performance of Mozart's exacting air, 'Märchen aller Arten.'

At their second concert on March 17, the West Kirby Choral Society were assisted by Miss Lysette Mostyn as vocalist and Mr. Egon Petri as solo pianist. The choir sang madrigals by Martin Peerson (1620) and Morley, Bantock's Scottish Lullaby, 'O can ye sew cushions,' Lloyd's Irish Folk-Song 'Kitty of Coleraine,' and Coleridge-Taylor's part-song 'The Evening Star.' Dr. W. B. Brierley conducted.

Mr. Arthur W. Speed conducted an impressive performance of Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius,' given in the splendid new church of Holy Trinity, Southport, on March 20, by 120 picked voices from the Southport and Birkdale Philharmonic Society in combination with an orchestra of forty-five. The vocal principals were Madame Amy Dewhurst, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. William Coleman, with Mr. Norman Woods as organist.

The Post Office Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Arthur Davies, gave a creditable performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Kubla Khan' with orchestra on March 18, the contralto solos being sung by Miss Mabel Braine. Another interesting event, the Wallacey Gentlemen's Glee Club concert, occurred on the same evening, when Mr. Wilfred Shaw conducted his excellent choir of fifty-six tenors and basses in singing 'Night' (Julius Harrison), 'Viking Song' (Coleridge-Taylor), vocal waltz, 'Hope' (Garrett), with other choral items expressively sung.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

Rumours and counter-rumours notwithstanding, the proposed opera-season (contemplated for this spring) cannot possibly be held until the autumn of 1915, when it will be found that Balling is in charge and the Hallé Orchestra utilised, with the Hallé executive taking a prominent part in the responsibilities of management. The requisite guarantee fund has been started, now totalling £1,700. The Quinlan Company, on tour in the early autumn of this year, will visit our New Theatre in September next, and it is understood that alterations to the present orchestral well will enable a large band to be accommodated without overflowing into the stalls.

As the season draws to its close, some arrangements for 1914-15 are already foreshadowed. The visits of the Hallé Orchestra to the Sheffield Festival in November and to Edinburgh next February will probably necessitate two miscellaneous concerts in the Hallé series instead of one as has been the custom recently. Advantage is to be taken of the opportunity thus afforded for a series of unaccompanied choral works to be given by the Hallé Choir. Would it not be a gracious act to repeat Bantock's 'Atalanta in Calydon,' especially as its initial performance here was what Berlioz would have called of the à peu près order? Bantock has also undertaken to furnish a compressed version of 'Omar Khayyâm' so that it may be heard at one sitting. Once we sat from 7 p.m. until 10.20 for Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion music, and within the same limits of time the bulk of the three sections of 'Omar' can be compassed. Arrangements have been completed for a return of Rachmaninov and for a visit from Scriabin, who is to play his Concerto and introduce the 'Prometheus' music. Why not be a 'whole-hogger' executive and fix up with Schönberg as well?

At the last February Hallé Concert Isoldé Menges came for the first time, playing the Mendelssohn Concerto and Bach's 'Chaconne.' There was no evidence in these two works of the outstanding merits we had been led to expect. She was certainly wonderfully venturesome in spinning a tonal thread of almost incredible fineness. Cortot's first appearance on March 5 was an event of quite another order, for which Manchester (save for a few of the cognoscenti) was quite unprepared.

The ordinary Hallé season was closed in rather grandiose manner with selections from 'Rienzi,' and Act 2 of 'The Flying Dutchman,' for which a big audience assembled, yet when the 'Dutchman' was performed under proper operatic conditions here last October, there was a half-empty house!

To the Pension Fund concert on March 19 came Sir Edward Elgar to conduct the second performance here of his 'Falstaff,' as well as the 'Enigma' Variations. Elgar and the Hallé players are by no means strangers, and were notably en rapport; he draws tremendously on his stores of nervous energy, and this quality was infused into the band's playing of his work—the varying Falstaffian moods of witty jocosity, high-spirited swagger, reckless boastfulness, &c., were all brought home to the listener with startling intensity.

The Royal Manchester College of Music celebrates its majority in July, and it is desired to mark the occasion by a combined effort to free it from debt, to provide an adequate endowment fund, to add to the number of free scholarships and exhibitions, and to open a hostel for women students. £4,500, raised voluntarily, has been spent during twenty-one years in payment (or partially so) of fees for poor and gifted students. Practically all its students have been drawn from every class of the community in this industrial area, showing how closely the art of music touches the lives of the people.

The final concert of the Manchester Vocal Society on March 18 was notable for the performance under Mr. Herbert Whittaker of Bach's 'Sing ye to the Lord' and the conductor's setting of the 'Sands o' Dee,' recently published.

The middle of March always produces a crop of choral concerts at towns in the vicinity of Manchester, where the earlier part of the year has been devoted to the rehearsal of more formidable works than is possible in the early autumn days. As typical of such efforts one might instance the Oldham Choral Society, who on March 17 produced Elgar's 'King Olaf' under Mr. Harry Brooks; and the Bolton Philharmonic Choir, conducted by Mr. Charles Risegari, who on March 18 sang Vaughan Williams's 'Towards the unknown Region.' This Society numbers a fair proportion of amateur orchestral players in its ranks, who are not daunted by even the 'Meistersinger' Overture or the 'Petite Suite' of Debussy.

The Preston Choral Society, still conducted by Dr. Bairstow, despite his removal to York Minster, devoted the evening of March 18 to the works (vocal, orchestral, and choral) of the late Coleridge-Taylor. A composer's work can be put to no severer test than this, and not even a programme so wisely contrasted as on this occasion could avoid the creation of a feeling of monotony well-nigh inseparable from such a procedure. The ladies' voices of the choir possess the lovely, soft, mellow quality so characteristic of Fylde singers, and quite outshone and outclassed the male section. The soloists were Misses Lillian Dillingham and Ferguson, and Messrs. Eisdell and Julien Henry.

At the beginning of the month the Warrington Male Choral Union had the assistance of the Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society at their annual concert, the two choirs joining forces in Brahms's 'Alto rhapsody,' conducted on this occasion by Mr. W. S. Nesbitt, of Manchester, one of the Blackpool ladies, Madame Clara Butcher, singing the solo part. A week earlier this Blackpool choir sang at the Bowdon Chamber Concerts, in the principal residential suburb of Manchester. The Halifax Glee and Madrigal Society about the same time appeared at Heywood, near Manchester, the programmes both here and at Bowdon being mainly drawn from works prepared at various periods for Lancashire Festivals.

At Kendal, on April 23 and 24, Balling and the Hallé Orchestra are to take part in the Westmorland Festival, Hamilton Harty's 'Mystic Trumpeter' and Arthur Somervell's 'Thalassa' Symphony being the chief new works; as a family the Somervells have done yeoman service in the cause of music among the fells and dales of their immediate district.

Herr Nikisch came to the last Harrison Concert on March 3, and included in his programme were Brahms's first Symphony, played by Balling five days earlier, and 'Till Eulenspiegel,' also played by Balling two days later.

[We have received an important protest against the criticism on the Hallé performance of the B minor Mass that appeared in our last issue. It is claimed authoritatively that this performance was a much better one than the remarks made would lead readers to suppose was given. It may very well be that our representative, who, we may say, is a close and capable student of the evolution of choral technique and interpretation, has formed ideals derived from the experience of the hot-house results heard at Festivals, that are practically unattainable in circumstances of a Society able to devote only a limited proportion of time to the preparation of one work, even though that work be, as it was described, 'the greatest work of its type.' In other words, our representative is crying for the moon. We would like to plead in mitigation of his crime that, after all, he is inspired by a jealous local patriotism, and a fervent desire that the Hallé Choir should be second to none in the land, and, further, he in no way implies any lack of confidence in the ability of the powers-that-be.—ED., M.T.]

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

The Darlington Choral and Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. T. Henderson, gave their second concert of the season in the Mechanics' Hall on February 17 to a crowded audience. The programme, which was mainly orchestral, included Mendelssohn's 'Son and Stranger' Overture, Sibelius's 'Valse Triste,' 'The Brautleid' from Goldmark's 'Rustic Wedding' Symphony, Beethoven's first Symphony and Violin concerto, Jarnefeldt's Preludium, and the 'Don Giovanni' Overture. The solo part in the Concerto was very finely played by Mr. Alfred Wall, of Newcastle. Miss Dilys Jones was the vocalist.

The Brussels Quartet provided the programme of the fourth concert of the Darlington Chamber Music Society on February 25, when they played Quartets by Beethoven in A major, Brahms in C minor, and Haydn in C major.

The Moody-Manners Opera Company visited Darlington from March 9 to 14, the works performed being 'Carmen,' 'Elijah,' 'Romeo and Juliet,' 'The Bohemian Girl,' 'The Puritan's daughter,' 'The dance of death,' and 'Maritana.'

The third Young People's Concert, given at Polam Hall on March 18, was devoted to chamber music.

At the Students' Association, on Monday, March 16, Mr. T. Henderson gave a lecture on 'Madrigals and the Elizabethan period of English music.' The illustrations included a number of works by Edwardes, Morley, Dowland, &c.

On March 18, the Newcastle Harmonic Society, under Mr. Edgar L. Bainton, gave a choral concert, the principal works being Schubert's 'Song of Miriam,' and Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer.'

The Newcastle Philharmonic Orchestral Society have resumed their concerts again this season, and gave the first of the series on Sunday evening, March 22, in the Tyne Theatre. Mr. Edgar L. Bainton is conductor.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

A new choral Society connected with the Albert Hall Mission, and known as the Albert Hall Choral Society, made its first appearance on February 26, in Sterndale Bennett's 'The May Queen,' which was admirably performed under the direction of Mr. Bernard Johnson. The solos were very acceptably given by Miss Florence Mellors, Miss E. A. Sawyer, Mr. Fisher, and Mr. Harold Glover. Mr. Gordon Thorpe (organ) and Mrs. Gifford Oyston (pianoforte) supplied the accompaniments.

On February 24 the Nottingham Glee and Madrigal Society selected Dvorák's 'The Spectre's Bride' for performance. The solos were undertaken by Miss Musson, Mr. Franklin, and Mr. Farnsworth. Mr. Herbert Richards accompanied with taste and ability, and Miss Seaton was heard in songs by Amy Woodforde Finden. The difficulties of Dvorák's work were ably overcome, and great credit is due to the conductor, Mr. C. E. Riley.

On March 4, the Subscription Concerts presented a most inviting programme with Elena Gerhardt, Thorpe Bates, Kocian, and Lamond as the attractions. On the following day the orchestral concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society took place, when the vocal element was solely provided by the Society's choir, a change that was heartily appreciated. The programme included 'Moonlight' (Fanning), 'You stole my love' (Macfarren), 'The Singers' (Mackenzie), and 'Morning Song' (Phillips); and three numbers from Elgar's 'Bavarian Highlands' Suite, and the March 'Hail, bright abode' (Wagner), were given with orchestral support. The chief items for the orchestra were Elgar's 'The Wand of Youth' (No. 2), Cowen's Suite 'Old English Dances,' in addition to Smetana's 'Bartered Bride' Overture and Beethoven's 'Leonora' No. 3. Still within the same week, at the Nottingham Samaritan Hospital Concert, Miss Carrie Tubb introduced a series of 'Nursery rhymes,' by Bernard Johnson, which proved acceptable both to audience and singer.

The Long Eaton Choral Society gave fine performances of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and Spohr's 'The Last Judgment' on March 17, when the solos were taken by Miss Dorothy Silk, Madame Ethel Edgar, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. George Parker. Mr. Ernest Smeeton conducted.

OXFORD.

The first concert of the term took place in the Music Room, Holywell, on January 24, under the auspices of the Musical Union, and included amongst other good things Mozart's Clarinet quintet (K. 581) and Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet (Op. 44). This was a delightful chamber concert, and the special feature about it was that the performers were all members of the Union, no professionals being employed.

On January 22 and February 5, Mr. Slowcombe and his party occupied the new Masonic Hall with their usual chamber concerts, and on January 31 the Rosé Quartet gave an excellent concert in the Town Hall, the programme including Mozart's Quartet in C major, Borodin's Quartet in A, and Beethoven's beautiful Quartet in E flat (Op. 74).

On February 11, under the auspices of Messrs. Acott & Co., came the event of the term when Sir Henry Wood and part of the Queen's Hall Orchestra gave a most enjoyable concert in the Town Hall. The programme included Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony (Op. 95), Grieg's 'Lyric Suite' (Op. 54), Percy Grainger's 'Shepherd's Hey,' and an arrangement of the Rhine-maidens' music from 'Götterdämmerung.' The greater part of the programme was new to Oxford. On February 28, Dr. Allen with his Oxford Orchestra gave a capital Promenade Concert in the Town Hall. It was well attended, as indeed it richly deserved to be. From March 5 to March 14 Herr Moritz Wurms and his orchestra occupied the Town Hall and played admirably, though the band was much smaller than on the occasion of his week's visit last term.

On March 3, the Professor of Music, Sir Walter Parratt, gave his terminal lecture in the Sheldonian Theatre on 'Some aspects of Fugue,' a subject peculiarly well suited to Oxford, as was abundantly shown by the very excellent attendance and the keenness and deep interest shown in the lecture from the very beginning to the end. Sir Walter has a most pleasant way of explaining things, and his calm and clear analyses of some of the Bach Fugues were most interesting and were highly appreciated.

The Balliol Sunday evening concerts as usual during term have been continued under the able direction of Dr. Walker.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The University Municipal Society at present confines its attention to the performance of choral music. Dr. Coward is the conductor, and a small choir of enthusiasts do excellent work. At the Spring concert given in the Mappin Hall the excellent plan was adopted of interspersing the choral pieces with chamber music, performed by the Henkel Quartet. The interplay of the two types of music proved interesting to a large audience, who, while in thorough sympathy with the necessarily immature efforts of the student-choir, could hear with full artistic enjoyment the finished playing of the professional party. The Quartets played were Dvorák in D, Schumann in E flat, and Beethoven in E flat, Op. 16. The choral programme was made up largely of simple part-songs suitable no doubt to the present acquirements of the members. When more expert, they might with advantage supplement Hatton and Pinsuti with the study of, say, a Bach Church cantata or some of the best madrigals.

In choosing 'Hiawatha' for performance, the Chapelton and District Sacred Harmonic Society departed from their custom of giving sacred works only. The change was well-advised, as was shown by the alert and versatile singing of the choir under Mr. M. Thompson's direction.

The Barnsley St. Cecilia Society also varied usage by restricting their choral activities to singing a few part-songs and for the bulk of the programme listening with evident enjoyment to the playing of M. Zacharewitsch and an assisting concert-party. Mr. T. Soar conducted the choir with ability, and they responded by performing their modest programme in more than usually polished fashion.

Mr. Percy Grainger, M. Louis Pecskaï, and M. Luiz Figueras were the performers at the fifth of Miss Foxon's Chamber Concerts. Brahms's C minor Trio was less successful than was the same composer's Sonata for violin and pianoforte in G major, which was played by Mr. Grainger and M. Pecskaï with understanding and sympathy.

A successful concert was given by the Sheffield Orpheus Gleemen (formerly the Sheffield Cambrian Choir), conducted by Mr. W. Poppleton; and performers at suburban churches have included 'Elijah' at Talbot Street Park Church (conducted by Mr. J. W. Parkin), Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm at Endcliffe Park Church (Mr. G. H. Tuffley, conductor), 'Elijah,' by the Victoria Hall Choral Society (Mr. H. C. Jackson), and the same work at Upper Chapel, Norfolk Street (Mr. A. Bagshaw).

The Doncaster Musical Society chose Dvorák's 'The Spectre's Bride' and Bridge's 'The flag of England' for their third subscription concert of the season. The choral genius of the Society has hitherto laid in vigorous rather than in expressive methods. Under the training of Mr. Wilfred Sanderson, however, the range of their equipment is being rapidly widened, and it was satisfactory to find how in Dvorák's vivid choral narration the singers revealed qualities of refinement and imagination expressed in a well-controlled tone and greatly improved diction. The soloists were Miss Mary Leighton, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Charles Tree.

At the last of Miss Foxon's Chamber Concerts the programme, entirely supplied by Miss Fanny Davies, was a pleasant departure from the hackneyed programme schemes which touring recitalists give.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

The series of six Saturday Orchestral Concerts, which occupy the place of the older Leeds Municipal Concerts, came to an end on February 21, when Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Capriccio Espagnol' was the least familiar piece on the programme, and its almost audacious brilliance, very cleverly reproduced by the orchestra, made a favourable impression. In Cowen's Concertstick Miss Gwendoline Roe, a highly promising young pianist, made her first appearance at Leeds and played with exceptional freedom and brilliance Tchaikovsky's mild 'Mozartiana' Suite was balanced by his sensational '1812,' and Elgar's 'Serenade' for strings, with its lovely Larghetto, was most enjoyable. Mr. Fricker, who has given his services as conductor ever since the Municipal Concerts were begun, directed this excellent concert, one of a series that has placed really good orchestral music within the reach of all classes. Unhappily the efforts made to popularise orchestral music have not been appreciated, for at a meeting of guarantors held at a later date, it appeared that a loss was made on the season, in spite of which it is intended to carry them on next season. This is far from an exceptional state of things at Leeds; indeed it may be doubted whether any of the chief concert undertakings manage to pay their way, but it is none the less discreditable to a city so populous and well-to-do. One exception to this rule of impecuniosity is furnished by the Leeds Bohemian Concerts, which, appealing to a smaller circle of musical people, seem to be flourishing. The last concert of the season was on March 4, when a most interesting and remarkable work was introduced to Leeds in Sibelius's String quartet entitled 'Voces intimae.' It is a most unconventional production, and suggests the broodings of a recluse living in close communion with nature. It is strange music, but it has power and sincerity, and its qualities were well brought out by Mr. Cohen, Mr. Ghent, Miss Simms, and Mr. Hemingway, who also played a Haydn Quartet and the 'Novellettes' of Glazounov. The Leeds Choral Union, who this season have added nothing new to their repertory, gave a good all-round performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius,' with Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. H. Brearley, and Mr. R. Charlesworth in the principal parts, and Dr. Coward as conductor. The choir was excellent, and sang with power and freedom. On the following evening the Leeds New Choral Society gave a programme of Coleridge-Taylor's music, 'A tale of Old Japan' being followed by 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'Hiawatha's Departure,' of which, under Mr. Turton's direction, effective performances were given. The principals were Miss Nora Moon, Miss Eva Sparkes, Messrs. Furness Williams and G. Parker. On March 17, Miss Ella Child gave a most interesting programme of modern pianoforte music at the last of Messrs. Haddock's 'Musical Evenings,' including pieces by Busoni (her former master), Debussy, Ravel, Leschetizsky, and Cyril Scott, of which she gave very brilliant performances. At their Sonata Recital on March 18, Messrs. Richardson and Maude played Sonatas for pianoforte and violin, by Bach (in G), Brahms (in D minor), and Grieg (in C minor). Miss Pattie Hornsby was the vocalist.

BRADFORD.

The Subscription Concerts, always popular and crowded, ended another successful season in brilliant fashion on March 9, when Nikisch and the London Symphony Orchestra gave a superb performance of Brahms's C minor Symphony, full of vitality and colour, but without a shade of mere virtuosity or effect for its own sake. 'Till Eulenspiegel' was another brilliant performance, and the 'Rienzi' Overture was noteworthy for the manner in which the conductor made the most of its brilliance and mitigated its occasional vulgarity. Altogether this was a memorable concert. On March 11, the Bradford Old Choral Society's programme coupled two parts of Haydn's 'Seasons' with Coleridge-Taylor's 'Death of Minnehaha.' Miss Emily Breare and Mr. Herbert Brown were most happy in Coleridge-Taylor's pathetic music, and in Haydn's were joined by Mr. Wilson Thornton. Mr. E. J. Pickles conducted. On March 14, the Bradford Permanent Orchestra's Concert was conducted by Mr. Julian Clifford, who was at his best in the Variations from Tchaikovsky's Suite in G, which lend themselves to brilliant execution.

Mr. John Dunn was the soloist in Spohr's ninth Concerto, of which he gave an exceedingly fine reading, free without exaggeration, and excellent in tone and technique. On March 20, the Bradford Festival Choral Society, under Sir Frederic Cowen, gave an interesting series of typical choral works by contemporary native composers: Elgar's 'Music Makers,' C. Wood's 'Dirge for Two Veterans,' and Balfour Gardiner's 'News from Whydah.' Miss Gertrude Lonsdale and Mr. Ivor Foster were the principals, and the performances reached a high level. Two of the Free Chamber Concerts organized by Mr. S. Midgley have to be recorded. On March 2, the programme was of exceptional interest, including César Franck's first Pianoforte trio, in F sharp minor, Brahms's Violin sonata in A, and Rubinstein's Pianoforte trio in B flat, of which Mr. Edgar Drake, Miss Southern, and Miss Ida Bellerby (pianoforte) gave creditable performances. Miss Carrie Birkbeck was the vocalist. The concert on March 16 introduced Violin sonatas by Dohnányi (Op. 21), Beethoven, and Mozart, which were played by Mr. Dunford, and Mr. Midgley. Miss Judson and Miss Baxendall were the soloists.

On February 27, Miss Sarah Fennings gave a violin recital, and introduced a most artistic and capable pianist in Miss Annie Corrie, with whom she played Franck's Sonata for violin and pianoforte.

OTHER TOWNS.

The Huddersfield Choral Society, on March 6, gave 'St. Paul' with great effect, under Dr. Coward's direction. The principals were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Oppenshaw, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Robert Charlesworth. On March 3, the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society, of which Mr. C. H. Moody, of Ripon, is conductor, gave their closing concert for the season. The last of the Huddersfield Subscription Concerts—which Mr. Watkinson, the promoter, announces his intention to discontinue, owing (among other causes) to 'gradual lack of support'—took place on March 17, when the Hallé Orchestra, under Mr. Balling, was heard in Brahms's third Symphony, and the 'Don Juan' of Richard Strauss. Miss Muecia Albertini was the soloist in Grieg's Pianoforte concerto. The Halifax Choral Society, though one of the oldest in the North of England, is more enterprising than most of its kind, and on March 5 was the first to introduce to the provinces Wolf-Ferrari's remarkable Cantata 'La Vita Nuova.' While very different from the Teutonic conception of oratorio music, it is both sincere in feeling and exceedingly effective, possessing the lyrical charm of Italian music along with easy musicianship and much originality, especially in the matter of orchestral colour, in which some curious musical combinations are essayed, sometimes with distinct success. Mr. Fricker secured a highly sympathetic and artistic performance. Miss Dorothy Silk and Mr. Thorpe Bates were the principals. Mr. Fricker is also conductor of the Morley Choral Society, which on March 3 gave a spirited performance of the 'Hymn of Praise,' with Miss Elsie Suddaby and Mr. J. W. Coltham as soloists. On March 12, the Halifax Orchestral Society played a new Suite for orchestra by their conductor, Mr. Herman van Dyk. The Halifax Madrigal Society, one of the finest choirs of its kind in the North of England, gave a concert on March 14, at which some interesting examples of modern music by Hugo Wolf, Max Bruch, Bantock, MacDowell and others was sung under Mr. Shepley's conductorship.

The Hull Harmonic Society, on March 6, introduced a new cantata, 'Persephone,' by a local musician, Mr. H. Ernest Nichol. The ancient myth has been arranged by the librettist, Mr. Colin Sterne, simply and effectively, and Mr. Nichol's music is flowing, straightforward, and capable of considerable expression. Under the composer's direction, and with Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, and Mr. Robert Burnett as principals, the cantata was quite adequately interpreted. Another novelty was an exceptionally interesting and well-written part-song by the Society's conductor, Mr. Walter Porter, a setting of a poem by Blanco White, 'To-night,' which was sung with a perfect appreciation of its refined nuances of expression.

The Hull Philharmonic Society, at its concert on March 13, essayed the three instrumental movements of the Choral Symphony, a great undertaking for an orchestra mainly amateur. Though it cannot be said that the inner meaning of the music was expressed, the performance under Mr. J. W. Hudson was very creditable to the Society. Miss Gladys Moger was a very charming vocalist. Mr. Alfred E. King's concert at Hull, on February 25, in which he took part as solo violinist, was successful. Mr. Percy Sharman gave the last of his York Chamber Concerts on February 23, when Franck's noble Pianoforte quintet in F minor and Mozart's Pianoforte quartet in G minor were given, a curiosity being afforded in a Concerto for three violins by Vivaldi. Miss Elsie Suddaby's fine singing of Mozart's 'Deh vieni' was an enjoyable feature of the concert. On March 11 Miss Leila Willoughby, with Mr. Hamilton Hartly as pianist and Mr. W. Hayle as vocalist, gave a chamber concert at York, Sonatas for violin and pianoforte by Brahms (in A) and Sjögren (in E minor) being played with sympathy and brilliant effect.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERDEEN.—An exceptionally large audience attended the performance of 'Elijah' given by the Choral Union on March 17. The work was splendidly sung under Mr. Collingwood's direction, and good assistance was given by Miss Mary Swailes, Madame Marian Walker, Mr. Brearley, and Mr. Herbert Brown.

BOLTON.—Gade's 'The Crusaders' was the principal number in the programme of the Choral Union's concert on March 4, and its pleasant strains were well interpreted under the direction of Mr. T. Booth. There was also a miscellaneous selection, in which the soloists, Miss Rachel Hunt, Mr. Webster Millar, and Mr. Richard Evans, took part.

BRIGHTON.—Considerable interest was aroused in the choice of Parry's 'Judith' by the Sacred Harmonic Society for their concert on February 19, and a performance of great merit was given under the direction of Mr. Robert Taylor. The choral-singing was of good quality throughout, both in tone and expression, and an excellent understanding of the work was displayed. The solo parts were taken by Miss Bessie Woode, Miss Palgrave Turner, Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. William Higley.

CALNE (WILTS).—The first concert of the Musical Society's twenty-eighth season was given in the Picture Theatre, Calne, on February 24, when Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend' was given by the choir and orchestra of about eighty performers. The solo parts were taken by Miss Ethel Bilsland, Miss Gertrude Winchester, Mr. Albert Watson, and Mr. John Prout. The conductor was Mr. W. R. Pulletin. Part of the programme was made up of miscellaneous music.

CARDIFF.—A large audience attended the performance of 'The dream of Gerontius' by the Harmonic Society on March 11, under the direction of Mr. Roderick Williams. An admirable interpretation of the work was given; in variety and truth of expression, and in efficiency, it took high rank. The solo parts were finely sung by Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. David Evans.

CHATHAM.—The fifth annual concert of Mr. Leslie Mackay's Choir took place in the Town Hall, Chatham, on March 18. The programme included Bantock's 'Awake, awake,' Byrd's 'I thought that love had been a boy' (mixed voices), Schumann's 'Within my garden' and 'On gentle wings' (for female voices), Floyd's 'The souls of the righteous,' and Elgar's 'It's oh, to be a wild wind' (male voices). The soloists were Miss Kathleen Bishop, Miss Nora Mackay, Mr. Rees Dier, Mr. Wilfrid Remnant (vocalists), Mr. H. Victor Mitchell (violin), and Dr. T. Haigh (pianoforte). Mr. Leslie Mackay was the conductor.

CULHAM.—The concert given by the Culham College Musical Societies on February 23 went, as usual, far beyond the scope of average school resources. The orchestra, for instance, gave a quite satisfying performance of the first movement of Beethoven's fifth Symphony. A selection from Puccini's 'The girl of the golden West,' Elgar's Serenade in E minor for strings, and Mozart's Ballet music from 'Les petits riens' were also in the programme. A party of glee-singers from the College Choral Society gave some unaccompanied singing under the direction of Mr. W. Pearce. Mr. Arthur Rowland (violin), Mr. Hendrick Purcell (horn), and Mr. John McCulloch (cornet) gave solos. Great credit is due to the conductor-in-chief and musical director of the College, the Rev. A. S. Arrowsmith, for the high standard and success of the concert.

DUNDEE.—The Amateur Choral Union gave a performance of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' on February 25. The soloists were Miss Evans-Williams, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. John Perry, and Mr. Herbert Brown. A professional orchestra of forty, under the leadership of Mr. W. H. Cole, supplied the accompaniment. Mr. Charles M. Cowe conducted.

HITCHIN.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was chosen for the first joint-concert of the Symphonic Society and a new choir formed with the Hitchin Ladies' Choir as nucleus. This took place on February 23, under the direction of Mrs. Walter Carling, with considerable success. Miss Alma Lewis, Miss Hayward-Webb, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. George Hall took the solo parts, and further contributed to the miscellaneous section, which opened with Gounod's 'Mirella' Overture.

LLWYNHENY.—The ambitious project of the Soar Choral Society to give a performance of Elgar's 'The Kingdom' with orchestral accompaniment was carried to success at Soar Chapel on March 7. Under Mr. D. Vernon Davies's direction the choir sang the difficult music ably and expressively. The solo parts were interpreted by Miss Emily Breare, Miss Winifred Lewis, Mr. David Harry, and Mr. William Higley.

MADELEY (SHROPSHIRE).—The Choral Society, now in its thirty-eighth season, gave an excellent performance of the whole of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' on February 23. The principals were Miss Winifred Thomas, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. James Coleman. An orchestra of efficient players from the Birmingham Festival, led by Mr. Harry Freeman, supplied the accompaniments. The choir were alert and careful throughout and equal to all required of them. Mr. James Smart conducted, as usual.

MALTA.—Under distinguished patronage the small choir of the Amateur Musical Society gave a selection from Gounod's 'Faust' at the Manoel Theatre on February 4. Prof. Genova conducted, and also contributed as violinist to a miscellaneous programme.

MATLOCK.—The Primitive Methodist Prize Choir recently gave a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'The Death of Minnehaha.' The singing revealed careful preparation, and did credit to the conductor, Mr. L. G. Wildgoose.

MIDDLESBROUGH.—The combined organ recital and choral concert by Mr. Felix Corbett and Mrs. Whatford's Vocal Society proved a popular success, many numbers in a varied programme being encored.

MONMOUTH.—An excellent performance of the three Parts of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was given by the Monmouthshire Musical Society on February 24, at the Rolls Hall, before a crowded and appreciative audience. The choir, numbering over seventy, was composed of singers from Monmouth and Usk; the orchestra of local amateurs was reinforced by a few professionals. Mr. Theodore Seaton, of Usk, conducted, the soloists being Mrs. Trewen Vizard, Mr. Roland Jackson, and Mr. Graham Smart.

MOTHERWELL.—The first performance here of Dvorák's 'The Spectre's Bride,' was given by the Y. M. I. Musical Association, under Mr. A. Ramsay Calder. The work had been well studied, and the singing was spirited. Miss Lillian Dillingham, Mr. Sam Hemsall, and Mr. Charles Keywood were the principals. Among the part-songs also included in the programme, Eaton Fanning's 'Daybreak' was effectively interpreted.

PONTEFRAC.—Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend' was effectively performed on March 12 by the Choral and Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. R. B. Walker. The principals were Miss Eva Rich, Miss Hilda Cragg-James, Mr. John Collett, Mr. Charles Tree, and Mr. W. Hall.

PORTH.—The annual Oratorio Concerts held at Salem Baptist Church, Porth, Rhondda Valley, were as usual a great success. Sir Edward Elgar's 'Light of life' (Lux Christi), and Dr. D. C. Williams's 'Psalms of praise,' were the works performed. The choir were accompanied by organ and orchestra, Mr. Rhys Evans conducting, and Dr. T. D. Edwards presided at the organ. The soloists were Miss Blodwen Lloyd, Miss Elsie Chambers, Mr. Hughes-Macklin, and Mr. W. Dan Richards.

READING.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' (complete) was performed by the Reading Philharmonic Society on February 18 before a large audience. The solo parts were sung by Miss Agnes Christa, Mr. Anderson Nichol, and Mr. R. E. Miles. Mr. George Wilby was the leader of the orchestra, and Mr. Osmond Daughtry conducted. — On March 4 Dr. Walford Davies's 'Everyman' was given by University College under the baton of Dr. H. P. Allen. The choir had a good grip of the work, and gave an enthusiastic and intelligent interpretation, the balance of parts showing only a weakness of the tenors. The solos were capably undertaken by Miss Ruth Freeman, Miss Sara Silvers, Mr. Francis Buckley, and Mr. Joseph Ireland. To the latter, as Everyman, fell the lion's share of the work, his fine, sonorous voice sounding splendidly in the beautiful hall. A large audience signified pleasure and approval of the work by prolonged applause.

RHOS.—Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was creditably performed by the 'Bethlehem' United Choral Society on February 25, under the direction of Mr. Dan Roberts. Miss Doris Carter, Mr. Ivor Walters, and Mr. Smith Anderson Duce were the soloists, and Dr. Caradog Roberts was at the organ.

SWANSEA.—The Swansea Church Choral Society gave a successful concert at the Albert Hall on February 19, with Parry's 'Judith' as the programme. The work was excellently performed under the direction of Mr. T. D. Jones, and the solo parts were taken by Miss Leah Felissa, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Bernard Knowles.

TAMWORTH.—German's concert-version of 'Tom Jones' with a miscellaneous selection were given by the Choral and Orchestral Society on February 24, the principal soloists being Madame Amie Glenda and Mr. R. Shackleton.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

At the Opéra-Comique has been produced 'La Marchande d'Alumettes,' a lyric-play by Madame Rosemonde Rostand and her son, M. Maurice Rostand, the music by M. Tiarko Richepin. The subject is borrowed from Hans Andersen, but treated in a singularly affected and cheap manner. The score, in all respects, is passable. The cast comprises Madame Guiraudon-Cain, Madame Brohly, MM. Jean Péricier and Francell.

At the same theatre, remarkably good performances of Gluck's 'Orphée,' with Madame Croiza in the title-part, and M. Vidal as conductor, are taking place.

Madame Lucy Arbelle, who had sued Massenet's heirs as responsible for the non-carrying-out the composer's wish that she should create the principal parts in his posthumous operas, has been awarded 30,000 francs (£1,200) damages, with the stipulation that any further disregard of the testamentary clauses concerning her would likewise entitle her to damages.

An interesting feature at the Concerts-Monteux has been the production of Igor Stravinsky's 'Petrouchka.' It is said that M. Monteux will follow with the much-discussed 'Sacre du Printemps,' which in many people's opinion had been heavily handicapped by M. Nijinsky's choreography, and which a concert-performance may help to appreciate more fully.

On March 15, the programme of the Concerts-Colonne comprised three short tone-pictures by Charles Koechlin, which are part of his Suite, 'Etudes antiques.' Other noteworthy numbers at the Concerts-Colonne were M. Fanelli's 'Cauchemar,' which M. Franz sang admirably, and Debussy's 'Jeux,' performed twice before very excited and riotous audiences.

The last concert of the Société-Philharmonique, devoted to works by Claude Debussy, has been a great success.

M. Chevillard, during the past month, has displayed great activity. Among the new works produced should be named a 'Rumanian Symphony' by Stan Golestan, which proved to be one of the best novelties of the season; a scene from Francis Casadesu's lyric-drama 'Cachaprés,' recently performed at the Brussels Théâtre de la Monnaie; Alexandre Georges's 'Chants de guerre,' and a Prelude from Fernand le Borne's 'Cléopâtre.'

The Société Indépendante has given a concert at which were introduced works belonging to several foreign schools: a Pianoforte trio by Peter Stojanovits, a Servian; songs by Armand Abita, a Tunisian; a Rhapsody for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte by M. Rozycki, a Pole; a Ballad for clarinet and pianoforte by Leo Weiner, a Hungarian; and pianoforte pieces by Leo Sachs, who alone represented the French school. But the following concert was devoted almost wholly to French music: 'Impressions d'Ariège,' for pianoforte, by Marc Delmas; a set of songs, 'Simone,' by Raoul Bardac, and Florent Schmitt's Quintet. A Pianoforte suite by the Belgian composer Van Cleef was also produced.

At the Société Nationale, the month's doings comprised productions of Marcel Poullet's tone-pictures for pianoforte, 'Bruges,' and of songs by Gabriel Grovlez.

An interesting and successful number in the programme of M. Montoriol-Tarrés's pianoforte recital was Enrique Granados's set 'Goyescas,' which has seldom been played in full.

A certain amount of excitement has been created by the announcement that during the course of the spring season, certain works by Signor Puccini, which belong to the repertory of the Opéra-Comique, were to be produced at the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, of which a Syndicate of English and American managers is about to take charge temporarily. The idea of producing the works has by now been relinquished.

The Russian season, which is to take place at the Opéra, promises to offer a wide range of interest. Among the works announced are Dr. Richard Strauss's ballet 'The Legend of Joseph,' and Igor Stravinsky's lyric-play 'The Nightingale.'

A rich merchant of Oloron, M. Lasserre, has bequeathed a yearly prize of 8,000 francs (£320) for a musical work to be selected by a special jury of composers and critics.

At the concerts given by the Revue Française de Musique, were produced, besides the works by British composers mentioned in the foregoing issue, String quartets by MM. Molnar and Kodaly (Hungarian school), Oscar Klemperer's Quintet (Bohemian), M. Enesco's Double Quintet, and songs by M. Golestan (Rumanian). The programmes also included songs by M. Birnenbaum (Bulgarian), by Walter Morse Rummel (American), and by Emil Riadis (Greek).

MUSIC IN TORONTO.

The principal event in the musical life of Toronto, or indeed of the Dominion of Canada, is the series of five concerts given annually by the Mendelssohn Choir, under the conductorship of Dr. A. S. Vogt, with the assistance of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. The Festival of this year took place on February 2-5, and achieved a most pronounced success in every way. The programmes were interesting and varied, and the abundant representation of English music was a most gratifying feature. The material of the choir is perhaps finer than it has ever been during the Society's brilliant career. Under the untiring guidance of its enlightened conductor, Dr. A. S. Vogt, the tone has acquired a brilliancy and purity, an ensemble and responsiveness which the writer, who has heard the majority of the world's most famous choirs, has not heard excelled anywhere. Perhaps the outstanding feature in the choir's accomplishments is mastery of tone-gradation and tone-colour. It is no exaggeration to say that Dr. Vogt can 'play' upon his choir with the freedom of a fine soloist.

Among the larger choral works included in the four-days' programme were Verdi's 'Requiem' and 'Stabat Mater,' Wolf-Ferrari's 'La vita Nuova,' Moussorgsky's 'Joshua,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' and 'The Music Makers' by Edward Elgar. The last work was admirably performed and created a profound impression, thanks to its masterly form and contents. The shorter choral works performed included Novovicki's 'Slav folk scenes,' the Austrian national ballad 'Prinz Eugen' (arranged for male choir and orchestra by Kremser), Julius Harrison's 'Viking song,' and a cappella choruses such as Tchaikovsky's 'Cherubim' Song, No. 3, and Granville Bantock's 'On Himalay' (both serving for examples of the highest art in choral interpretation), 'Mein Schatzlein' by Max Reger, Sibelius's 'The broken melody,' and smaller works by Colin Taylor, Sir Frederick Bridge, Bullard, Wostenholme, and Eaton Fanning. The excellent Chicago Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Frederick Stock, played Granville Bantock's 'Overture to a Greek Tragedy,' Delius's 'Paris,' Elgar's 'Introduction and Allegro' for string orchestra, Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris,' Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance,' Richard Strauss's 'Death and Transfiguration' and 'Till Eulenspiegel's merry pranks,' Rhapsody 'Italia,' by Cassella, Schumann's A minor Pianoforte concerto (with Mr. Harold Bauer as soloist), and Brahms's fourth Symphony.

At each of the four evening concerts of the series the large Massey Music Hall, which seats over 3,000 people, was filled to its utmost capacity. A movement is on foot at Toronto to furnish a guarantee fund to enable the Choir to undertake a concert tour of the principal cities of Great Britain and Germany, in the spring of 1915. Should the plan materialise, there is hardly any doubt that the Choir will make a striking impression.

The interest of the musical season at Toronto has also been heightened by the work of the National Chorus under Dr. Albert Ham. On January 20 this excellent and highly-trained body gave a concert of exceptional interest, of which the chief feature was a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Sea-Drift.' A long programme was given, including MacDowell's six-part Barcarolle, Max Bruch's 'Jubilate, Amen,' other part-songs and madrigals; and solos were provided by Madame Marie Rappold (vocalist) and Miss Vera Barstow (violin).

Foreign Notes.

BARCELONA.

The first Festival organized by Madame Maria Barrientos, the celebrated singer, has proved a great success. The programme, devoted to Handel, included the 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day.'

BERLIN.

It is stated that Arnold Schönberg is composing a lyrical drama in six tableaux after Balzac's 'Seraphita.' 'Der Heidengott' is the title of the new opera written by Siegfried Wagner.

BERNE.

The Swiss-Tonkünstler-Festival is announced to take place on June 27 and 28. Four concerts will be given at the Festhalle. The programmes contain many novelties: a Toccata for organ by Barblan (Geneva); a 'Sonata drammatica' for pianoforte by E. Frey (Petersburg); a Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra by R. Ganz (Berlin); an overture, 'Richmodis,' by Denzler (Luzern); 'Ein Festgesang Neros,' for mixed choir and orchestra, by Klose (Munich). At the seventh Subscription concert, under Fritz Brun, a splendid performance of the seldom-heard 'Dante' Symphony by Franz Liszt was given.

BONN.

The Choral and Orchestral Societies of Bonn and Coblenz, under the direction of Prof. Grüters and Herr Kes, have combined and arranged for a series of music Festivals (on a great scale) to be held alternately in those towns. The first of these Festivals will take place at Bonn, on May 19 to 21 next, under Prof. Grüters.

BRUSSELS.

At the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Saint-Saëns's Opéra-comique 'Le Timbre d'argent' (first performed at the same theatre in 1879) has been revived and very favourably received. The composer afterwards played the solo-part of his fantasia 'Africa.' The King and Queen of the Belgians were present.

CHICAGO.

Elgar's 'The Music Makers' and Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' were the programme of the Apollo Musical Club's concert in February, given under the direction of Mr. Wild.—Hamilton Harty's 'The Mystic Trumpeter' is in the programme of the Chicago and North Shore Festival, which takes place in May.

DONAUESCHINGEN.

A very interesting historical concert of unpublished works of the 18th century was recently given here. A Symphony in E flat by Gossec, a Trio by Roeser, a Trio for string instruments by Graß, and the Overture and Aria from Haydn's Opera 'Ritter Roland' were heard. The material was supplied by the Court-library of Prince Fürstenberg.

MARSEILLES.

Emanuel Chabrier's opera 'Gwendoline' will be revived shortly, with Mlle. Champredon and M. Duclos in the principal parts.—Successful concert-performances of the second Act of Gabriel Fauré's 'Penelope,' and Saint-Saëns's 'La lyre et la harpe' were heard under the conductorship of M. Hasselmans.

MONTE-CARLO.

The lyrical drama 'Cléopâtre,' one of Massenet's last works, has been successfully produced at the Opera. The title-rôle was played by Madame Maria Kousnezov. On the same day the monument erected to the memory of the composer was unveiled.

PETERSBURG.

Under the direction of Georg Schneevoigt, of Helsingfors, fourteen performances of 'Parsifal' were arranged to take place from March 9 to April 9 at the Théâtre Dramatique.—The 'Glinka' Prizes (founded by Belaiev) have been awarded to: M. Wassilenko (Symphonic-poem, 'Hercus nocturnus'), M. Gnessin (Symphonic-poem, 'Wrubel'), M. Tcherepnine (Six pieces for pianoforte).—Gabriel Pierné's 'The children's Crusade' has recently been performed here for the first time by the celebrated Archangelsky Choir and the famous Chérémétiev Orchestra, under the baton of von Hesselbarth.

RIGA.

Gustav Mahler's 'Resurrection' Symphony (No. 2), with organ, soli, and choir, was magnificently and impressively performed under Franz v. Hoesslin's baton.—Schneevoigt revived a very interesting Concerto for organ and orchestra by Vivaldi, and conducted a Symphony Singulière by Franz Berwald.—Gabriel Pierné's 'Children's Crusade' was given here under the conductorship of Alfred Kirschfeld. Walter Braunfels, of Munich, conducted his Serenade for orchestra and played his Pianoforte concerto at two concerts here.—Zimbalist, Ignaz Friedmann, Szigeti, and William Pitt Chatham gave successful recitals.

ROME.

The prize for the composition of the Requiem to the memory of King Umberto has been awarded to Giacomo Setaccioli, professor at the Lyzeum Santa Cäcilia, Rome. There were twenty-five competitors. The work was to be performed at the Panthéon on March 14, the anniversary of the death of King Umberto.

VIENNA.

Three part-songs for male voices by Sir Edward Elgar (Op. 45, Nos. 1, 3, 5) were on the programme of a concert to be given on March 14 by the celebrated Wiener-Männergesangverein, under the direction of Victor Kehldorfer.—During Holy Week 'The Redemption' (Gounod) will be performed at the Elisabeth Church.

Miscellaneous.

The Liedertafel of the Deutscher Turnverein of London is an old-established body. It was established in 1868, and it has met continuously ever since. Mr. C. Wolff, who is one of the officials, has been a member from the beginning. The choir consists of about thirty members. On March 7 they gave an interesting invitation concert at the headquarters of the Turnverein at King's Cross. The programme included the Alto Rhapsody of Brahms, which served to show that the choir is well equipped, and that the conductor, Herr Julius Schröder (whose concert at Queen's Hall is noticed elsewhere) is a musician of fine taste. There was no pretence at punctilious finish in the singing, but it was informed by the right feeling and spirit. The solo was sung impressively by Fräulein Lydia John, who also sang during the evening several songs that further exhibited her fine style. The choir sang a number of part-songs, and Herr Dettmar Dressel showed that he is a competent solo violinist.

The programme of the South Wales Musical Festival, which is to take place on April 27, 28, 29, and 30, at Swansea, Neath, Mountain Ash, and Newport, is an encouraging instance of high ideals and progress in Welsh musical affairs. It includes Cowen's 'The Veil,' Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony, Brahms's Alto Rhapsody, a Beethoven Symphony, Dvorák's 'The Spectre's Bride,' and Wagner excerpts. The Queen's Hall Orchestra will be engaged, and the conductors will be Sir Henry Wood, Mr. T. Hopkin Evans, Mr. W. Miller, and Mr. Arthur Sims.

An attractive programme is offered for the Norwich Festival of October next. It includes 'Omar Khayyám,' 'Samson and Delilah,' 'Parsifal,' 'Hiawatha,' the 'St. Matthew' Passion, and Parry's 'A vision of life.' Two orchestral novelties will be given—'Spring fire' by Arnold Bax, and 'The tinker's wedding' by Hamilton Harty. It is interesting to find in a Festival programme the name of Dr. Ethel Smyth, whose clever accompanied chorus, 'Hey nonny no,' is down for performance.

In connection with the recent production of 'Parsifal' in London we are reminded that two concert-performances of the whole opera were given by the Royal Choral Society, under Sir Joseph Barnby, in November, 1884. The cast was as follows: Fräulein Malten (Kundry), Herr Gudehus (Parsifal), Herr Schützgraf (Amfortas), Herr Scaria (Gurnemanz), and Mr. Henry Pyatt (Titurel and Klingsor).

The Music Club organized a reception to M. Alexander Scriabin at the Grafton Galleries on March 19. There was a very large attendance, but unfortunately, owing to the guest's indisposition, he was unable to be present.

At Perth, on March 2, Mr. Richardson received a presentation from his Choral Society in appreciation of the admirable work he has long carried on as the Society's conductor.

The Novello Choir sang at St. Pancras Workhouse on February 24, and at the Fulham Workhouse on March 10. Mr. Harold Brooke conducted on both occasions.

At the Bradford Mechanics' Institute on February 17, Mr. Herman Van Dyk gave a lecture-recital of 'Russian Music,' assisted at the pianoforte by Mrs. Van Dyk.

A course of six lectures by Mr. Paul Rochard on 'Music and pianoforte playing' was commenced at 26, Castle Street, Hinkley, on March 2. The series concludes on April 6.

On February 24, Mr. James Gallie lectured before the Greenock Musical Association on 'Mainzer, Hullah, and Curwen.'

A prize of £10 is offered by a member of the Three Arts Club for the best original song. Particulars are announced in the Three Arts Journal for March.

Answers to Correspondents.

MODUS.—It is impossible to answer such a query in a correspondence column. You might as reasonably present a pistol at the editorial head, and bid him stand and deliver a brief analytical account of Beethoven's Symphonies. The Modal system is also a subject not lightly to be taken in hand. Any good manual on plainsong will give you what you want, and there is, of course, Grove, in which you will find the subject dealt with briefly—in nine pages.

A. B.—A collection of short choral preludes (average length one page), moderately difficult, that would probably answer your purpose is the set of two hundred by Carl Piutti. They are published in one volume, and may be obtained through Messrs. Novello.

NORMA.—‘A pair of organs.’ The word ‘pair’ has almost lost its use as a synonym for ‘set,’ but still survives in ‘a pair of stairs.’ In the case you inquire about, it simply means an organ with a complete set of pipes.

BORIS.—Da teatro is an Italian expression meaning ‘in the theatrical style.’

CHORAL TECHNIQUE & INTERPRETATION

BY

HENRY COWARD.

MUS. DOC. OXON.

Published as a Net Book.Price, Cloth, gilt, Five Shillings net.

PRESS NOTICES.

"The title and the author's name together will be sufficient to secure for this book a wide circle of musical readers. No one has done more than Dr. Henry Coward to further the remarkable advance in choral technique which has been so efficient in this country in recent years. Dr. Coward has spent his life in perfecting a system of choral training which he has exemplified in his Sheffield Choir, and carried triumphantly over the English-speaking world and even further. In this book he tells precisely what this system is and so fortifies precept with example, illustrating his points with quotations from musical masterpieces, that it places a valuable manual of instruction in the hands of every choir-master. It has been his aim to give 'such advice and instruction that no single problem connected with choral singing shall remain unsolved.' Those who know his work will not need to be assured that the book is eminently practical, but it may be added that it is written in the plain and forthright style which is characteristic of the author."—The Times, January 15, 1914.

"The author is one of the most brilliant examples of a man climbing from unpropitious surroundings to a high artistic plane, and it is always interesting to learn the factors that have contributed to such marked advancement. For many years past Dr. Coward held the first place as a conductor of choral societies, and although of late years several other musicians have shown themselves equally capable of securing fine performances, he must always be regarded as laying the foundation of what may be termed the new choral technique. Dr. Coward therefore writes with the authority of one who has verified the truth of his theories and proved the correctness of his methods by practical results of the most convincing kind. Choir trainers will not always agree with Dr. Coward's views of interpretation, and, truth to tell, they are more technical than æsthetic, but it is not too much to say that in this book will be found all the chief principles of the impressive delivery of choral music. Moreover, the book is written with a directness and clearness of expression which reminds one of the learned professor's answer to the young lady who expressed her enjoyment of his recent lecture: 'I am so glad you were able to follow me. I took great care that what I said should be understood by the meanest intelligence.'"—The Referee, January 11, 1914.

"Dr. Coward's great work, the publication of which has been eagerly anticipated by conductors, voice-trainers, and choralists generally, is hot from the press. In it the father of British choralism—that is to say choralism with art in it—gives away all his secrets. Aspiring organists and choir-masters have long sat at his feet eager to learn the secret of the marvellous power that the Sheffield doctor has wielded over the thousands of choralists with whom he has come in contact. Some of them by assiduous attention have assimilated some of the methods of the master; but it has been realised that behind the whole there is the personality of the man, his grit, his grip, his intense earnestness, and his determination to achieve success, however exacting the task before him."—Sheffield Independent, December 20, 1913.

"The book is a bewildering mine of information on the subject of choral technique; I can find no single point missing. But this is not all. Dr. Coward, in a spirit of tremendous enthusiasm, acknowledges that there may be some point overlooked or not elucidated with sufficient clearness, and therefore he invites queries, these to be addressed to him at the publishers.' There are some excellent words of wisdom for the use of the choral conductor—which, indeed, are equally applicable to any other musical conductor. 'The man who lacks tact,' says Dr. Coward, 'is not fit to be a conductor.' 'Making rehearsals enjoyable is a valuable kind of tact. One of the best methods is to turn a petty annoyance into a pleasantry.' Dr. Coward brings his valuable treatise to a close with a series of appendices, in which is much wisdom as to hints on private practice, the necessity of a high ideal, singing with Latin words. There is a capital index, and a complete list of the musical examples used as illustrations, with the special point indicated for which they were selected. Altogether a most interesting and useful book."—Daily Telegraph, January 31, 1914.

"What that method is, and how it may be applied to choral singing, is told unreservedly and lucidly in Dr. Coward's book 'Choral technique and interpretation.' This book is something more than an exhaustive and, to choral conductors, an invaluable text-book of what may be conveniently described as 'choralism.' It is an unconscious autobiography of one of the most notable figures in the world of music. Henry Coward has written himself into these pages. We can visualise the man as he stands before a chorus, sure of himself, blunt and forceful, labouring at an idea, and gradually crystallising it into an apt phrase or a still more felicitous quotation or anecdote; persistent, insistent, prepared to bully or wheedle a choir into submission, and finally 'getting there' by sheer force of his genial, dogged, characterful personality. He has put into the book, freely and fully, all he knows. He lays out for the benefit of inexperience all the harvest of thirty years of labour, study, and a degree of minute specialisation which in choral music has no parallel among even the great choir-trainers who preceded or are contemporary with him."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph, December 26, 1913.

"There can be no doubt that few living musicians are better entitled to discourse on the subject of choral singing than Dr. Coward, whose book on 'Choral technique and interpretation' is certain to be widely read, and its precepts carefully considered. As a conductor his interpretations may not always commend themselves to one's judgment, but as a choir-trainer it is no exaggeration to assert that his labours have marked a new era in chorus-singing. For this reason his clear exposition of the methods by which he has achieved his aims has an obvious value, and his book is the more readable because of the lively style and genial enthusiasm that characterise it. His description of his conduct of a rehearsal is full of suggestive points by which every choir-trainer may profit, whether he employ them with literal exactitude or not."—Yorkshire Post, January 14, 1914.

A VALUABLE BOOK FOR TEACHERS AND STUDENTS.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

THE RECENT REVOLUTION
IN ORGAN BUILDING

By G. L. MILLER, F.R.C.O.

Price Five Shillings net.

The Foreword of the book informs us that the aim of the author is "to help those called upon to decide the serious question of the purchase of an organ . . . who are distracted by the contending claims of rival organ builders . . . and who are disinclined to rely upon the opinion of . . . experts . . . and wish to look into things themselves and intelligently purchase an instrument which will not drive the organist to . . . profanity every time he uses it." This book amongst other things shows how much greater variety and power may be obtained from an organ by the extraordinary improvements of the last few years. It thus aids greatly in diminishing the cost of organs, whilst at the same time improving them.

The Organist and Choirmaster.—"Altogether a most fascinating little book. We are so often asked by our readers for information on the latest developments of organ building that we cannot possibly do better than advise every reader of The Organist and Choirmaster to get the book at once."

Musical News.—"In this book, Mr. Miller gives an account (which is both full and clear) of all the devices which have revolutionised organ building, his explanation moreover being accompanied by a large number of illustrations; and very interesting it is. . . We hear that it is to be translated into French."

Church Times.—"Every organ-lover will desire to add this volume to his library of works on the organ."

The Standard.—"The volume, which is now in its second edition and is being translated into French, is certainly one of the best of recent contributions to organ literature and should prove invaluable to teachers and students alike, as well as to all who are interested in any way with the history and construction of the king of instruments."

Yorkshire Post.—"A book, the appearance of which is timely, in regard to the extraordinary developments of organ building in modern times."

The Western Morning News.—"An inexpensive little volume, setting forth clearly the lines on which many new instruments of to-day are being built, as opposed to the older methods still in vogue. Its usefulness is proved by the fact that the author has been asked for permission already to translate it into French."

The Scotsman.—"The book gives an excellent succinct survey of the work done in adding new powers to the king of instruments by such men as Willis, Cavaille-Coll, and Hope-Jones."

Glasgow Herald.—"The author, Mr. George Laing Miller, knows his subject well and expounds it convincingly."

Mr. C. W. Perkins (Organist to Birmingham Corporation).—"Miller's book I am showing to all my pupils, as I think it is one of the best contributions of the time to organ literature."

THE ATHENÆUM.

A fine work . . . and is admirable at all points.

YORKSHIRE POST.

The name of Dr. Walter G. Alcock is in itself a sufficient guarantee of the sound teaching of organ-playing, and his book, "The Organ," more than sustains his reputation. . . . There are many useful exercises on various technical points, and some short original pieces which serve as further illustrations of the author's teaching. It is very clearly printed on good, stout paper, and from every point of view is a desirable book.

THE SCOTSMAN.

The work is a distinctly useful addition to books of musical instruction.

THE BRISTOL TIMES AND MIRROR.

Although many books of instruction about the organ have been published, the latest is among the best. Its merits are sundry. . . . If the book be thoroughly mastered no other one is needed for the purpose of tuition, for it is the key to everything that has been written for the king of instruments. The print is exceedingly clear, and the book itself neat and attractive.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS.

This is not an "instruction" book in the ordinary use of the term, for its scope is too wide, and the information given is so largely the result of personal experiment and experience that those who have already advanced in the art of organ playing will find many hints and suggestions which will prove of practical service. The book is admirably divided into sections dealing with the elements of organ art; and a very important chapter is that on hymn-playing.

THE SUNDAY TIMES.

Every young organ student will find himself greatly helped by "The Organ," a new manual of the instrument by Dr. Alcock.

THE CHOIR.

We congratulate Dr. Alcock on having produced a work which will rank with the best of its kind.

THE MUSIC STUDENT.

The work is up-to-date in every way, it is well arranged and graduated, and begins at the beginning. . . . One must look a long way to find a work which unites as much sound instruction with so much good music of all grades, all under one cover.

THE BOOKSELLER.

Dr. Alcock has produced a very helpful and useful book which the ambitious player will do well to study with great care and attention; he who follows the directions here given will undoubtedly find his work as an organist very materially assisted.

CHURCH FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

Written by a master of his subject, "The Organ" makes an immediate appeal to organists of all descriptions, for the matter contained in the book embraces all that is necessary from simple pedal exercises—called by some "first steps"—up to pieces requiring all the resources of modern organ technique.

HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh, and the Victoria University; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University; the Royal Academy of Music; the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

SELECTED PIANOFORTE STUDIES

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

In Two Sets (Eight Books),

PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE EACH BOOK.

THE present collection of Studies is designed to provide teachers with a short course of Pianoforte Technique adapted to the needs of the average pupil, the intention being to spare the teacher the labour of choosing a sufficiently varied selection from the large mass of material existing, and at the same time to ensure that the different departments of technique shall be undertaken in the order which experience has proved to be the most beneficial.

The Studies are grouped in two Sets, and are so arranged that the different Books in which they are contained may be taken in consecutive order, but pupils who are already further advanced than the elementary stage represented by Set I. may commence at once with Set II., which will be found to be complete in itself, and to illustrate all the essential elements of technique.

When additional studies are desired, or studies on certain subjects which are not touched upon in this series, the larger collection, published under the title of "Progressive Studies" (from which the present examples have been selected), is of course available.

Learn to Play at Sight during the Summer months.

The Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing is the ideal Course of Lessons for the summer months when there is little desire to spend long hours in wearisome practising. By taking the Course now you will be able to resume your pianoforte playing and your technical studies in the autumn with a new accomplishment—the ability to play at first sight. Only by being able to do this can you obtain the fullest and most complete pleasure from your pianoforte playing.

Why is it that a pianoforte student who can give a perfectly correct rendering of a piece after repeated practising cannot play a much easier piece at first sight? Simply because by ordinary methods of tuition it is necessary to “spell out” the notes and to translate them into impulses to be conveyed by the nerves to the arms and fingers.

The Ehremayer System eliminates all the necessity for “spelling out” the notes by creating an automatic and instantaneous connection between the observation of the printed notes—in whatever form and however combined—and the muscular actions of the arms and fingers which are necessary to play them.

There is no other System which does this or even claims to do it, and yet it is the first essential for Sight-playing. The Ehremayer System, after three months of about twenty minutes daily practising, will enable any pianist to play at first sight any piece within his technical abilities.

It is surely worth your while to investigate this System, which has the endorsement of professional musicians, and is enthusiastically praised by hundreds of students who have taken the Course. The following testimonials are extracts from letters received during the past few weeks, and are entirely unsolicited.

Only twenty minutes daily practising for three months.

TESTIMONY.

“I have no hesitation in saying that this Course has been of the utmost service to me. Difficulties in Sight-playing have now disappeared.”

H. G. C., Kew Green, S.W.

“The Course has been of the utmost benefit to me, and I have no hesitation in saying that it has been the best Course that ever I had, in that the result has been so quickly achieved.”

A. B. S., Dunfermline.

“I can most strongly recommend your Course, and will do so with pleasure.”

F. N. L., Chipstead, Surrey.

“I think the lessons are fine, and I cannot see how anyone could fail to benefit by taking your Course.”

J. A. W., Manchester.

“I am delighted with the progress I have made. The improvement in my reading is simply marvellous. My fingers seem to fall automatically on the right notes. I think your System is wonderful. It seems to solve every difficulty and in so pleasant and interesting a manner. The Lessons have fully accomplished the purpose for which I took them.”

C. S. B., Lancaster.

“I am glad I took up your System, seeing the great benefit I have derived from same.”

L. S., Mile End, E.

“I cannot speak too highly of your Course for Sight-playing, as I have made marvellous strides in my playing through it.”

G. C. C., Tamworth.

EDWARD CUTHBERT BAIRSTOW.

Edward Cuthbert Bairstow was born at Huddersfield on August 22, 1874. His father was an amateur musician with no pretence to more technical skill than sufficed to make him an enthusiastic member of the Huddersfield Choral Society, and his mother had no special musical leanings. Before he reached his teens he had displayed musical aptitude, and this was fostered by organ lessons taken from Mr. Henry Parratt (brother of Sir Walter Parratt), who was the organist of the Parish Church. Huddersfield has the honour of being the nursery of other well-known organists, amongst whom, beside the brothers Parratt, may be mentioned the late Dr. Peace, and hard by Shepley claims Dr. Charles Wood, and his brother, W. G. Wood, who was unhappily cut off in the prime of his career. In fact, this great manufacturing centre with all its absorbing industrialism has for generations been well to the front in musical doings.

In 1887 Bairstow was sent to Nottingham High School, where he remained for about two years. Here, out of school hours, he had organ and pianoforte lessons from Mr. Arthur Page, one of the best-known members of the profession in the city. In 1889 another move was made, this time to the finely appointed School established by the Grocers' Company at Hackney Downs, in the North-Eastern district of London. For the musical side of his education during this period he was placed under the late John Farmer, of Harrow School fame. Farmer had a studio at Steinway Hall, and thither the youth repaired for three years, working chiefly at the pianoforte, and in a less ordered way at composition, for Farmer, whatever his musical gifts, was not to the manner born as an expert in the art of teaching composition. He set Bairstow to work at harmonizing chorales, and thus at least laid a solid foundation of harmonic progression, around which other developments could be built, and fortunately for the young student, Farmer's taste in pianoforte music was strongly in the direction of Bach. Bairstow took a prominent part in the musical activities of the Grocers' School by deputising at the organ at the services and playing pianoforte solos at the School concerts, and he was also concerned in the performances of Sullivan's operas, which were produced at the School with extraordinary completeness and ability under the direction of Mr. Broughton Black, who was then one of the masters of the School. All this provided experience certain to have its ultimate use.

In 1891, when he was seventeen years of age, he made his entry into the profession by becoming the music-master of a private school at Windsor. He was there two years, and then felt impelled more seriously to prepare himself for a musical career. He sought the advice of Sir Frederick Bridge, who counselled him to endeavour to take a musical degree. Durham was then coming into the field to cater for non-residential candidates, and in other ways this University offered advantages that Sir Frederick thought would meet Bairstow's circumstances. But the first examination was to take place in six weeks from this time, and Bairstow knew scarcely anything of even composer's counterpoint and still less of the austerities of strictly academic counterpoint required by the University. Nevertheless he set to work, and was able to pass the first examination, and the remaining portion of the Mus. Bac. examination was completed in 1894. He had now to examine himself, with the result that he realised that although he knew Beethoven's Sonatas and Bach's 'Forty-eight' as pianoforte music, he was practically ignorant of classic organ music and much else that was indispensable associated with the service of the Church of England. It was therefore very wisely decided that he should become an articulated pupil of Sir Frederick Bridge. He began this fructifying period of his career in October, 1893, and for nearly six years he was set to a thousand-and-one tasks under the eagle eye of Sir Frederick. He played the organ, gave lessons, did research work at the British Museum, and, in his desire to be useful, if he had been called upon would have 'polished up the handle of the big front door.' In this way angular corners were rounded and rough places made smooth, and he began to find his level.

He well remembers Sir Frederick saying, 'No doubt you think you are a little Beethoven, but there are plenty of fellows as clever as you are.' A wholesome remark. On one occasion his zeal brought him perilously near to a career of reckless crime. Music was wanted quickly from Novello's, and Bairstow scorched on his bicycle to get it; but in Parliament Street he was arrested and afterwards summoned for furious riding. At the police court he was offered the alternative of a 14s. fine or ten days' hospitality. He paid the fine.

Through the influence of Sir Frederick, Bairstow, in 1894, was appointed organist and choirmaster at All Saints', Norfolk Square, where the Rev. William Boyd, the composer of 'Fight the good fight,' was vicar. He remained there until 1899, and built up a good teaching connection. Amongst his engagements was the conductorship of a private choral Society at Petworth, in Sussex. This Society consisted of local gentry, and it gave a series of concerts at various villages in the district, a scheme that afforded great satisfaction to everyone concerned.

In 1899 Bairstow became the organist and choirmaster of Wigan Parish Church, where he succeeded Mr. Moody,—who went to Holy Trinity, Coventry, and from there to Ripon. This appointment was an excellent experience. The service was of the cathedral type, the organ a very good one, and the voluntary choir excellent. Soon after arriving in the North he accepted the conductorship of the Southport Philharmonic Society, a position he resigned in 1903 in order to conduct the Blackburn St. Cecilia and Vocal Union, an organization that has an honourable record in choral circles. Its recent repertory has included Elgar's oratorios, the 'Dream of Gerontius' and 'The Kingdom.' In 1901 he took the Mus. Doc. degree at Durham, and in 1902 he duly fulfilled an important engagement by marrying Miss Hobson, a daughter of a resident in Wigan.

The next move took place in 1906, when he became organist and choirmaster of Leeds Parish Church. This place of worship, with which Samuel Sebastian Wesley was associated, is famous the world over for the high standard of its musical services. At a cost of over £700 a year a permanent choir consisting of thirty boys, eight male adult altos, eleven tenors and eleven basses is maintained. No Cathedral in the country has so large a musical establishment. The boys live at home, but are educated at a secondary school at the cost of the church. Full choral evensong is sung daily. Obviously, the Sunday choir of sixty voices, all admirably equipped, finely trained, and constantly singing together, can be trusted to deal with the finest music. Bach's motet 'Sing ye to the Lord,' Wesley's 'O Lord, Thou art my God,' and other masterpieces of great composers, as well as the classic anthems and services of the English Cathedral school, are regularly sung; and in Advent and Lent Brahms's 'Requiem' and Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion are given with a choir of 150 voices. Bairstow's position as the head of all these resources was splendid experience, and a potent formative factor in his career. During this period he became conductor of still another excellent organization, the Preston Choral Society, and this post he is still able to retain. On certain special occasions the Blackburn and Preston Societies unite (the two towns being not far apart), and with the Hallé Orchestra from Manchester they form an imposing combination capable of presenting successfully the greatest works.

In 1913 Mr. Tertius Noble, as announced in our columns, to the great regret of his wide circle of friends resigned his position as organist and choirmaster at York Minster, in order to accept an important and attractive appointment offered to him at New York—where, it is a pleasure to record, he has been very successful. Not without much reluctance to sever his connection with the Leeds Parish Church, Bairstow accepted the vacant post at the Minster, and he commenced his duties there in July, 1913. That with his high ideals and mastery of method he will make the most of the resources at his disposal, and that York powers-that-be will loyally support so capable and earnest a musician, may be regarded as certain. Naturally the conductorship of the York Choral Society fell to Dr. Bairstow, and here again his fitness for the position has been quickly demonstrated. Recently an exceptionally fine performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion music was given in the large Exhibition Hall to an overflowing audience. The York public has now a very good reputation for attendance at good concerts, but on this occasion it established a satisfactory record.

Dr. Bairstow talks fluently of his experience and views. Below we give some of his obiter dicta on various generally interesting topics.

CHURCH MUSIC.

Nothing, he says, can supplant the music of the 16th and 17th centuries in the repertoire of the English Church, because it was written with a pure motive by men of undoubted genius, bears with it just the same simple, solemn, unchanging atmosphere as the archaic language of the Bible and the Prayer Book, and, like that language, it is impossible to find anything modern which has just the same faith-strengthening, belief-hardening effect. But it must be sung extremely well. It is best heard unaccompanied, and bears the same relationship to most modern Church music (as to its performance) as the folk-song does to the pot-boiling ballad, and is as much more difficult to sing.

All the music of this period needs most careful editing, with marks of tempo, expression, and phrasing. Some really unimpeachable authority ought to do this, for it is easy to err either on the side of exaggeration or tameness. A capital example of how it should be done is the Evening Service by William Mundy, edited by T. Royle Shore.

The numerous trios for alto, tenor, and bass debar many parish church choirs, who have but weak male altos, from attempting the music of the 18th century, but there are many fine anthems which might be done oftener. To name a few: 'O sing unto the Lord,' 'O give thanks' (omitting the alto solo), and 'Remember not, Lord,' all by Purcell, 'In Thee, O Lord' (Weldon) (a tenor instead of an alto can sing the upper part in the duet), 'Turn Thee unto me' (Boyce), of which there is an excellent edition edited by Dr. Walford Davies.

Coming to later times, he wonders how many more copies Novello's sell annually of 'Blessed be the God and Father' (Wesley) than they do of, say, 'Wash me thoroughly,' by the same composer! And yet the latter is infinitely the greater as music, and not much if any more difficult to sing.

As to modern music, there must always be a bigger market for the shallow and obvious than there is for that which contains thought and emotion that are great and deep, for the simple reason that there are more shallow and 'obvious' than there are great and deep-thinking people in the world. But there are palpable reasons why the shallow and trivial is much more out of place in the church than it is even in the concert-room. There is, however, another class to which a great deal of music of every period belongs—music that is simple, beautiful, and sincere. This all can appreciate and benefit by. It does not express very abstruse thought, but its thought and notion are unpretentious, clean, and heartfelt. This is the line to be followed by modern English composers who want to do good work, and who may not have the great gifts required for the finest creations.

THE MUSICAL COMPETITION MOVEMENT.

Competitions he believes are doing a great work, especially where the music chosen is good, and the judges engaged are really artists and not mere academic, unemotional dryasdusts. He favours using a scale of marks as a guide and a remembrancer to the judge, but not as an exact and mathematical representation of the proportionate values of the performances one to the other.

ORGAN MUSIC.

The trend of music is to become more expressive. Instruments, to be of use, must keep pace. Their mechanism must get less obtrusive, and be more sensitive. The pianoforte has not lagged in the onward movement; but until recently the organ has been 'the lame duck lagging, lagging all the way.' Now as a means of expression it is not to be despised. It has many beautiful and distinctive colours, which can be easily changed in kaleidoscopic fashion by a good player, and this without half so much distraction and loss of atmosphere as there used to be.

But from Bach's time onward to within recent years no great composers (with the exception of Mendelssohn) troubled themselves to write organ music. This did not matter much before the modern organ was at last evolved. Then, as there was so little absolutely great music worthy of its powers, organists naturally fell back on arrangements, and one may say with perfect truth that some of the arrangements of great orchestral works, containing as they do an aroma of genius, are infinitely superior in effect to the majority of the works of second-rate organ composers, notwithstanding what is lost in transcription; that is, of course, when they are well played on a thoroughly up-to-date organ. But the deficiency in first-class organ music is now being made up, and things will no doubt move along more rapidly in the near future.

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

Congregational singing should be unisonal. It is musically ridiculous for from six to thirty people to be singing in parts while from two hundred to two thousand sing the tune or improvise dreadful 'parts' of their own. The clergy should instruct their congregations in such rudimentary facts as these. Music must be the means of expressing the thoughts embodied in the words, otherwise it is mockery. Singers cannot express emotions which they do not feel, therefore congregations must not be content with the emotion roused by taking part in a mass of sound irrespective of the meaning of the words. It is almost impossible to get a satisfactory effect from a large number of people singing together without a conductor, but if there is no settled, steady rhythm, and if innumerable pauses of indefinite length are interpolated, the effect is deplorable. Dr. Bairstow thinks that organists are largely responsible for this. Not only should they keep strict time in congregational music, but they should learn to phrase better than they often do, and use every means at their disposal to make a rather unrhythmic instrument as rhythmic as may be. If congregational singing were unisonal, then in many country churches the choir would be useless. Therefore, if there is a choir worthy the name, some part of the service, however small and simple, should be assigned to them exclusively.

CHORAL SOCIETIES AND THEIR FUTURE.

Picture palaces and music halls undoubtedly compete with the choral Society. After the hustle of a day's work, people desire entertainment that will not tax their intellect but which will nevertheless provide plenty of sensation and excitement. This is bad for the financial prospects of choral Societies, but it will, he thinks, make them more efficient in the end. There is still an audience to be found for good choral music, if that music is not merely sung correctly but vividly interpreted. To this end the individual singer's technique must be improved—you cannot give your mind to interpretation whilst you are feeling uncertain about the notes and the time. Conductors must be less self-conscious at rehearsal and performance, and their technique must improve so that their gestures are more poetic and graceful and not meaningless and clumsy, as is so often the case. The orchestral accompaniments must be as good as the choral work, and here is the opportunity for municipal aid. Why it has been denied to music and granted to art galleries, goodness knows! Choral and orchestral Societies are far more deserving than any other form of musical society in a provincial town, and as long as they have to fill their orchestras with inefficient amateurs, the finer efforts of the choir are more or less spoiled. There are exceptions, but it must be said that the average amateur cannot play to the beat, cannot play pianissimo, and cannot get the required tone or play in tune anything like so well as the professional. Especially is this the case with wind players.

Dull and lifeless performances (sometimes grossly incorrect) of dull and lifeless, worn-out music, have had more to do with the difficulties that have fallen upon many choral Societies than all the cinematographs and hippodromes together.

RICHARD STRAUSS'S 'LEGEND OF JOSEPH.'

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

Dr. Richard Strauss's new work, whose production is to be one of the most important features of the coming Russian season at the Drury Lane Theatre, is a ballet arranged much after the fashion of the mediæval 'Mystères,' archetypes of the modern play. But within the intentionally archaic frame is contained an elaborately symbolic plot, teeming with intentions and well-devised suggestions, which in conception and in carrying out is decidedly modern.

The subject, by Hugo von Hoffmansthal and Count Kessler, is founded on the Bible story, but aims at exhibiting the violent conflict resulting from the contact between the sumptuous, shallow, impulsive world of Paganism—in the present case, Pharaoh's court—and the mystical purity of Joseph, who represents the Hebraic, monotheistic spirit. Potiphar's wife in this version differs greatly from what she is shown to be in the Bible, and is depicted so as to become the incarnation of the conflict between the two principles.

The whole play is a mixture of real and unreal, of plain realism and of ideal superhumanity, constantly interchanging or interwoven. For that reason, the authors have seen fit to situate it not in its actual historical frame, but in surrounding borrowed from Venetian scenery of the times of Veronese; in other words, to interpret it, from the picturesque point of view, as the Venetian painters interpreted Bible history.

'Too scrupulous an accuracy,' says Count Kessler in a recent interview, 'can but end by impeding the freedom of imagination. A narrowly restricted field would have prevented the action from acquiring its more general purport.'

The plot runs thus: During a feast in Potiphar's house, Joseph makes his appearance, and Potiphar's wife becomes forthwith enamoured with him. But the pure-souled youth, wrapt in his dreams, takes not the slightest notice of her. Later, we see Joseph asleep. In a dream an angel appears to him, and gradually takes the shape of Potiphar's wife. But she has in fact come to him; she watches his sleep, struggles for a time against temptation, and ends by kissing him. The kiss awakens Joseph, who rises and prepares to flee.

In her resentment she calls the guards and orders him to be laden with chains and led to death. But at that moment appears an angel who saves him from the unjust doom. Potiphar's wife strangles herself with her necklace.

'The tragedy,' says Count Kessler in the interview already quoted, 'results from the sudden contrast that makes itself felt within the soul of Potiphar's wife: a contrast that overwhelms her simply because she is incapable of resolving it. The arrival of Joseph, the little being informed with the intoxicating, almost divine atmosphere of a distant country, the infant Lohengrin, a celestial aureola around his brows, reveals to her heavy, restless soul a new world, a world of freedom, the divine world of life. She, who has never known temptation nor emotion; she, the lake of dead, chill water, whose surface has rippled under no breeze, finds herself for the first time impressed by rays of sunshine coming she knows not whence. She awakens simultaneously to emotions and to the impossibility of satisfying them. She acknowledges in Joseph the being who can never be hers. And then arises in her soul the deadly conflict between the two worlds: the world to which she belongs and the world that she has no hope of reaching. The one must annihilate the other. If she does not wholly destroy even to the memory of that divine world which remains inaccessible to her, then she is doomed to destruction. And thenceforth the tragedy resides in the collapse of a soul that is noble and proud, but overlaid and incapable of liberating itself.'

As to the carrying out of the work from the choreographic point of view, Count Kessler continues:

'Our object has been gestures that may be understood without reference to any convention: realistic and yet rhythmical—passing through all stages of rhythm, from pure dance to the barely perceptible rhythm of impassioned acting. That end of thing was available to the ancient Greek magics, and Wagner met with it in one or two exceptional cases, with Niemann or Sucher for instance. But as in the present case language does not intervene, we have been obliged to conceive of acting somewhat differently. We have tried to create a new art proceeding in equal parts from music and from gesture associated in rhythm.

'Of course, this being the case, the music must be endowed with even more direct a suggestive power than in the current lyric-drama; must associate even more closely with the acting, so as to reveal what is going on within the souls of the characters. Strauss has had to deal with a problem that made the greatest possible call upon his luxuriant conceptions of art. The scene in which Joseph, after being awakened, rises, lets his cloak fall, and appears unclothed to the eyes of Potiphar's wife—the scene that serves to assert the impossibility of a union between these two beings—Strauss has spent over a year in preparing and compassing it. As it stands now, it is to be considered as a climax not only in the work but in modern music. Music appears here as a kind of religion, in the etymological sense, connecting (religare) the spectator to the drama in a straight line, without words being resorted to, without even the spectator being allowed to remember that there exists such a thing as verbal expression.'

The score is not yet available. But it is said to be remarkably brilliant and effective, and to possess a good deal of suggestive power—a suggestive power of the same descriptive and narrative order as that of 'Salome.' It is scored for about a hundred instruments, including four harps and four celestas. The duration of the work is one hour.

THE POSTHUMOUS MANUSCRIPTS OF MUZIO CLEMENTI.

By T. DE WYZEWA AND G. DE SAINT-FOIX.

The name of Clementi is associated in the minds of most musicians of to-day, only with the sonatas which they were made to practise in their youth. Some perhaps are acquainted with the 'Gradus ad Parnassum,' but few are aware that during the many years which he spent in England, Clementi was well known as a composer of symphonies. Over twenty of these works were performed in London, and were much admired both by the learned critics of the day and by the general public. About a dozen symphonies were composed and performed in London between 1785 and 1795, two being published in 1787 by Clementi himself, and numbered Op. 18. Besides these, we are told by Clementi's pupil, Ludwig Berger, that the fine Sonata in G minor, Op. 34, was an arrangement of another Symphony belonging to this first group; and it is very possible that the Sonatas in B minor and D major (Op. 40) were also transcriptions or rearrangements of works originally conceived and carried out for full orchestra.

The disappearance of the scores of Clementi's symphonies might be accounted for by the supposition that the composer had destroyed the MSS. of those written before 1800, after having utilised their musical material for his pianoforte works. But we cannot admit this hypothesis with regard to the symphonies and overtures which were his principal occupation between 1812, the year of his return to London from Russia, and 1832, the year of his death. He had entirely given up composing for the pianoforte in 1800, and both he and several of his family and pupils let it be known that he was dissatisfied with pianoforte music and wished to devote himself to the composition of symphonies. Between 1812 and 1824 the programmes of the London Philharmonic Society include almost every year one or two 'New Sinfonias, MS., composed for this Society'; and the critics of the day agree in recording the enthusiasm with which these works were received, and in praising their melodic invention and richness of orchestral treatment, although Clementi was then between sixty and seventy years of age. He visited Paris, Munich, and Leipsic at this time, and in all these places his symphonies met with the same success, or at any rate with the same favourable criticisms in the Press.

Of the ten or more symphonies which constitute the composer's final artistic period not a single trace remains, with the exception of a first movement in D major, of which the MS. score is preserved in the British Museum. In its mastery of instrumental technique it is comparable with the seventh and eighth Symphonies of Beethoven, and if Clementi's other symphonies were on the same level, we need not be surprised at the esteem in which they were held.

Clementi died on March 10, 1832, at his country house, Elm Lodge, near Evesham, in Worcestershire. In his will, dated January 2 of the same year, he left the sum of £5 to his friend, the composer William Horsley, with which to buy a ring as a token of the composer's gratitude to him for classifying and putting in order his manuscripts, which thenceforward became the property of his widow. We can hardly doubt that among these manuscripts were the scores of the ten or twelve symphonies which, we may say, had been the principal occupation of his last thirty years. It is difficult to believe that before his death he should have destroyed the scores to which he had attached so much importance, especially as he does not seem to have made any use of them for the 'Gradus ad Parnassum' or for the few pianoforte works which he wrote between 1812 and 1832.

Nevertheless, all search for these lost works has hitherto been completely fruitless. The British Museum possesses nothing beyond the one fragment mentioned above, and this is probably only a sketch, since we know that Clementi composed a Symphony in C major, the first movement of which had as its principal themes the subjects which this MS. presents in the key of D. We have made inquiries of the descendants both of Clementi and of William Horsley, of the librarian of the Philharmonic Society, and also of the keepers of the archives of the concerts at Paris and Leipsic at which Clementi's symphonies were performed; but we have been unable to obtain the least trace of information of any kind as to the fate of the missing scores. It has not even been possible for us to make sure whether the scores of the symphonies did or did not form part of the collection of MSS. left by Clementi to his widow.

The mystery is the more strange, since we are considering not some poor and obscure musician of the days of Handel, but a master of world-wide reputation and honour, who died as late as 1832 as the owner of considerable property within a moderate distance of London.

After two years of fruitless investigation, we take this opportunity of addressing ourselves directly to the English public. Perhaps our inquiry may have the good fortune to meet the eye of some reader who knows of the existence of a manuscript score of Clementi's symphonies, or who may remember having heard something about them. The discovery of these lost works would, we feel sure, be of the greatest importance for the history of European music, and especially for the history of music in England.—(Translated for the 'Musical Times' by E. J. DENT.)

SCHÖNBERG: A SHORT SKETCH OF HIS LIFE.

BY CHARLES MACLEAN.*

Schönberg is not yet in 'Grove' (1910), and the notices in other works of reference are infinitesimal. After dredging extensively for facts, it is believed that the following abstract of his case as a whole is fairly accurate.

At Vienna, the school of Anton Bruckner (1824-96) was followed by that of Gustav Mahler (1860-1911). For Mahler's symphony style, see Zeitschrift xiv., 166, March, 1913. Arnold Schönberg was born at Vienna, September 13, 1874 (parentage not stated in Wer ist's), was mainly self-taught in music, and perhaps for that reason struck out an independent line as composer. He also practised painting in a rough way, and has exhibited. On October 7, 1911, he married the sister of the composer and opea-conductor, Alexander von Zemlinsky (1872-). Just before this the poet and librettist, Ernst von Wolzogen (1855-) had started his 'Ueberbrettl' movement, along with O. J. Bierbaum and Frank Wedekind, and the composer Oscar Strauss (1870-). Ernst von Wolzogen was half-brother to Hans Paul Wolzogen (1848-), had an English mother, and was brought up almost as an English boy. He was of course the librettist of Richard Strauss's 'Feuersnot' (October 28, 1902, Berlin). In 1901 he had a 'Buntes Theater' in the Köpenikerstrasse, Berlin, for the advancement of his views in elevating the cabaret style, and he also organized tours. Schönberg got an appointment as conductor under Wolzogen in this scheme, and moved to Berlin at the end of 1901. The 'Ueberbrettl' movement ran but a short course; see a dissertation thereon by Karl Georg Göhler (1874-), conductor of the Leipsic Riedelverein, in Die Musik, April, 1902. A little later than this, Richard Strauss (1864-) having recommended him, Schönberg was appointed harmony-teacher at the ever-expanding Stern Conservatorium (established 1850) at Berlin; this post he held till June, 1903. He then went back to Vienna, where he joined a set of men with advanced views, such as Karl Horwitz, Heinrich Jalowetz, Alban Berg, Anton von Webern, Egon Wellesz, &c. Parties arose there, both for and against him. He was one of the founders of the Vereinigung schaffender Tonkünstler concert organization, of which Mahler was President. He was helped to fame by the Viennese-Roumanian violinist, Arnold Josef Rosé (1863-) and his celebrated string quartet party (Rosé, Paul Fischer, Anton Ruzitska, Friedrich Buxbaum); this party are just now in London, and on February 3 have performed Charles Villiers Stanford's Quartet in G minor. He was supported also by Oscar Fried (1871-), the Berlin conductor. In 1910, he was 'permitted' to give independent composition lectures at the Vienna Conservatorium (established 1817). In the autumn of 1911 he went back to Berlin. At the same time he published his 'Harmonielehre' (3370 in the Universal Edition, pp. 484). In fewer words, Schönberg, now a man of forty, but looking much older, is a Viennese, who stayed in his native town till he was twenty-seven, saw the world for three or four years, returned to his native town, and there achieved a very considerable position solely on his own merits as an original composer, and has now for the last three years settled at Berlin.

When a man is only forty, has gone long years without a publisher, has had in his portfolio a magnum opus for thirteen years without a performance, and only partially divulges the dates of his conceptions, orchestrations, &c., the confusion of opus-number with chronology is apt to cause hazy conclusions. In reality this is a case of a man's quite gradual evolution, mostly in the face of the public, from being normal to being a Futurist. Nevertheless one may accept, as a more or less mechanical convenience, the three-stage division of the works which has been suggested in The Times, i.e., the period before going to Berlin at age twenty-seven, a lustrum of seven years from then till age thirty-four (a few years after the return to Vienna), and from there till now. The first of these stages (down to 1901) apparently saw the genesis of: Twenty songs with pianoforte, to texts by several authors (Opp. 1, 2, 3, 6); the String quartet in D minor (Op. 7) the illustrative String quartet 'Verklärte Nacht' (Op. 4). That may be called a stage of normal works which have inherited the contrapuntal technique of Bruckner and Mahler, but show a decided originality and great beauty. The second ge (1901-08) apparently saw: the 'Gurre-Lieder,' for soli, chorus, and orchestra, to text by the Dane, Jens Peter Jacobsen, translated into German by Robert Franz Arnold; 'Pelleas und Melisande,' a long symphonic-poem, 1902 (Op. 5), conspicuous for its exhaustive thematic treatment; six songs with orchestra, to various texts (Op. 8); Chamber-symphony for small orchestra, in E minor (Op. 9); second String quartet, in F sharp minor, with a voice-part to Stefan George's text in the first two movements (Op. 10). [Nota bene.—The 'Gurre-Lieder' (orchestrated several years after the first) have quite a mammoth orchestra, the necessity of which is not at all transparent. Here are the following (where each item means a family): 8 flutes, 5 oboes, 7 clarinets, 10 horns, 4 trumpets, 7 trombones, 6 kettle-drums, much percussion, 4 harps, celesta, and string quintet as large as possible. This second stage may be said to be one where Schönberg adopts a larger canvas, and fills it with much wilder but still highly pregnant matter.] The third stage (1908 to date) apparently saw: Three pianoforte pieces (Op. 11); fifteen 'George-Lieder' with pianoforte, to text by Stefan George; Five orchestral pieces, about 1909 (Op. 16); monodrama 'Erwartung'; six short pianoforte pieces, about 1911 (Op. 19). In this third stage Schönberg throws over almost everything hitherto accepted, i.e., consonance, modality, thematic use, form, even programme, and retains only rhythm and instrumental colour. He boldly calls this music a mere emanation from himself, which has no relation to the receptivities of his hearers. That is a very self-satisfied doctrine, and only a handful of devotees pretend to understand or take pleasure in the products. Examination will show that the journey between the two extremes has lasted barely ten years.

The significant performances abroad seem to have been these. The Rosé string party is said to have given the first performance of the Sextet about 1902 at Berlin, where the audience 'was tumultuous and hostile.' No report of this first performance can be traced in Die Musik, which begins from October, 1901, or in the foreign correspondence of English journals. The same party gave the first String quartet at Vienna about 1904. In February, 1905, the Vereinigung schaffender Tonkünstler at Vienna performed the 'Pelleas und Melisande.' Later the Chamber symphony. The Rosé party did the first String quartet on June 30, 1907, at the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein Festival at Dresden. They did the second String quartet (with voice) at Vienna in December, 1908. At a Vienna concert in January, 1910, were given: First part of the 'Gurre-Lieder' with pianoforte accompaniment only; the Fifteen 'George' songs; the Three clavier pieces, Op. 11. At Berlin, at the end of 1910, Oscar Fried produced 'Pelleas und Melisande' at the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. At Berlin at beginning of 1912 were given, without orchestra: Early songs, three of the Five orchestral pieces, arranged for two pianofortes, eight hands; the six short clavier pieces; the 'George' Song-cycle.

In March, 1913, at Vienna, a complete performance was given, with orchestra, of the 'Gurre-Lieder.'

The foreign Schönberg literature is extensive. The esteemed secretary of our Vienna Local Branch, Egon Wellesz, pupil of Schönberg, gives at Zeitschrift xii., 342, September, 1911, a much more authoritative analysis of the works than can be pretended to here. At Zeitschrift xiv., 5, October 29, 1912, Hermann Wetzel, of Berlin, gives an extremely hostile five-column review of the 'Harmonielehre.' It is permissible however to say with regard to the illustration at p. 30 quoted as the acme of extravagance, that this is an example to pupils of modulation to the flat supertonic, that the parts move by degrees or easy intervals in the soundest manner, and that some may regard the whole as a very good example of stimulative modern instruction. Two Berlin authors have written sympathetically on the latest style of the compositions in Die Musik: Arno Nadel in June, 1912, and Leonhard Welker in October, 1912. A book has been published, 'Arnold Schönberg' (Piper, Munich, 1912, pp. 90, demy 8vo), eulogistic essays, short and long, on his music and painting, by eleven devotees: Alban Berg, Paris von Gütersloh, K. Horwitz, Heinrich Jalowetz, W. Kandinsky, Paul Königer, Karl Linke, Robert Neumann, Edwin Stein, Anton von Webern, Egon Wellesz.

The only performances as yet in England have been as follows: On January 11, 1913, the pianist R. Buhlig played the Three clavier pieces, Op. 11, at Steinway Hall. On September 3, 1912, Sir Henry Wood performed the Five orchestral pieces, as above said, at a Promenade Concert, this being the first time that they had ever been played on the orchestra. On November 1, 1913, the Flonzaley party played the first String quartet. On January 15, 1914, the Music Club (late Concert Goers' Club) gave a reception to Schönberg; some of his early songs were sung, and the London string party (Sammons, Petre, Warner, Lockyer, Warwick-Evans, Sharpe) played the Sextet. On January 17, 1914, Schönberg conducted the Five orchestral pieces at the Queen's Hall Symphony Concert, as above said. On January 23, 1914, the London String party again played the Sextet in public at Bechstein Hall. The then Berlin correspondent of the Musical Times wrote at page 183, March, 1911, of the Oscar Fried performance of 'Pelleas und Melisande,' was enthusiastic about the technique, and said at the end, 'For the first time in German music can we see past Strauss. Schönberg's is the first path that leads anywhere forward, and we may confidently hope he will take us into as interesting places as his great predecessor.' But this was about a work composed in 1902. In the Musical Times, January, 1914 (page 11), Ernest Newman writes warmly on the still earlier 'Gurre-Lieder,' which he calls 'the finest musical love-poem since Tristan.' In the Musical Times, February, 1914 (page 87), he keeps an open mind on the present Futurism, but thinks that Schönberg may be ahead not only of us but also of himself. He concludes, 'I doubt whether Schönberg himself would always detect an alteration of, or addition to, his score.' That much may be posited with little doubt.

It will be seen that we have just had specimens in London of Schönberg's north and south poles. Musicians of all shades of thought found the 'Verklärte Nacht' Sextet excessively beautiful, a sort of 'Tristan und Isolde' on the strings; nor were the contrapuntal mastery and novel handling of the string-combination less noticeable than the musical beauty. The report of its hostile original reception has therefore puzzled Londoners. It is 3662 in the Universal Edition, and he who runs may read. But there was an equally strong opinion against the Five orchestral pieces. To say nothing of almost every other musical attribute having been thrown overboard in this his latest style, as above stated, Schönberg here seems even to abandon the resources of the orchestra. It is not using the resources of an elephant to make it pick up pins; and the orchestra of Beethoven, Wagner, and Strauss can do something better than show off small tricks. In Scriabin (Zeitschrift xiv., 167, March, 1913) we had at any rate fulness. Here only everything which was odd and extreme in the orchestra was represented. Mustel's pretty little 'Celesta' made really the best effect in the performance, because for a while it held the matter together with a definite, if small, tessitura. The general view was to treat Schönberg with every respect, for he has shown his powers as a fine musician and man of genius; but to express complete inability to follow him in his last and really hideous negations.

Occasional Notes.

Students of early English music will be interested to know that A FORGOTTEN MASTERPIECE. Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of Holy Week (at 5.30 p.m. each day), the Lamentations of Tenebræ were sung to settings unearthed and scored by Dr. Terry from a Tudor MS. The fact that they this year displaced those of Tallis and Whyte, hitherto sung, indicates that the work is no mere antiquarian curiosity. It is in three sections,—one for each Tenebræ—and the score occupies 120 pages of MS. It is anonymous, but its virile counterpoint, and rich sombre colouring stamp it as the work of one of the great masters of the period. It is sometimes suggestive of Whyte, sometimes of Tye, and frequently of Tallis. Dr. Terry submits the theory that its authorship was then so well known that the scribe omitted mention of it.

THE BACH FESTIVAL AT VIENNA. This year's Festival of the Neue Bachgesellschaft will be held at Vienna on May 9-11. The long-established and wealthy Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde have invited the Bach Society, and are superintending the performances. The conductor will be Herr Schalk, of the Vienna Opera. The programme is chosen entirely from Bach's works. Perhaps it is felt that the Austrian Catholics are less familiar with Bach than are the North Germans, as several well-known works have been selected. It has been the rule to exclude the 'Passions' and other great works on account of their familiarity; but this year the 'St. John' Passion is announced, and also two of the most familiar Cantatas, No. 6 ('Bide with us') and No. 11 (the 'Ascension' Oratorio). Among the other works announced is Cantata No. 71, an early work composed for a Town Council election in 1708, and the only one printed in Bach's lifetime (or indeed in the whole 18th century). The Solo Cantata, No. 84, and an Air from No. 16, with violin obbligato, re also to be given, and the duet from No. 101 in the 'Paternoster Chorale.' The most noteworthy of the remaining items are the St. Ann's and B minor organ fugues, the sixth 'Brandenburg Concerto,' the A minor Violin concerto (these were played at Eisenach last year), an air with lutes from a 'Birthday Cantata,' the C major suite for orchestra, the Duet Sonata with violin in G minor, and that with viola da gamba in G major. There will, as usual, be a church service, as in Bach's time. The Cantata on this occasion will be No. 166, 'Wo gehest du hin.' With two exceptions only, Viennese artists will take part. This Festival may serve very materially to spread appreciation of Bach's music in districts where it is not yet familiar.

We are sorry to see the GLASTONBURY announcement that the Arthurian SUMMER Festival at Glastonbury is postponed until 1915. Mr. Rutland Boughton is, however, actively engaged in planning a Holiday School of Music-drama at Glastonbury during August. The chief study is to be 'The immortal hour,' by Fiona Macleod and Rutland Boughton, which will be publicly performed with sufficient backing is promised. Miss Margaret Morris is to assist in the production. The principals provisionally engaged include Mr. Frederic Austin, Mr. Francis Harford, and Mr. Arthur Jordan, and assistance in conducting is promised by Mr. Charles Kennedy-Scott and Mr. Edgar Bainton. Influential patronage has been secured.

THE IMPERIAL CHOIR. The choral organization called together from the existing choral Societies of Greater London by the indefatigable enthusiasm and energy of Dr. Charles Harriss, and known as the Imperial Choir, is now engaged in active preparation for the season's concert. This takes place at the Albert Hall on May 14, when Dr. Harriss will direct a varied and excellent programme of choral numbers. We understand that 1,000 singers will take part. It is arranged that 2,000 members of the Choir shall pay a visit to the Bristol Exhibition on June 13, and give two concerts.

CANDID CRITICISM A HUNDRED YEARS AGO. On May 3, 1814, just one hundred years ago, Tom Cooke—afterwards so well known as principal tenor singer at Drury Lane Theatre, and composer of numerous popular songs and glees, also as teacher of Sims Reeves—was given a benefit at the Theatre Royal, Crow Street, Dublin. He selected 'Lionel and Clarissa' in which to astonish his old Dublin friends, for previously he had been known only in his capacity as leader of the orchestra in the Irish capital. What must have been his chagrin when he read the following candid critique of his performance in the Dublin Monthly Museum for May, 1814—a journal devoted to literature, music, and the drama: 'Mr. Cook has all the qualifications for a singer, except one; but that one is indispensable. A singer without a voice is like a title without an estate—it is a Bonaparte in Elba!'

Mr. W. W. Cobbett (52, Circus Road, N. W.) offers a prize of £50 for the best original String quartet (in Sonata, Suite, or Phantasy form) in which the two violin parts shall be of equal interest and importance. Entries close on December 31. Mr. Cobbett will himself examine the manuscripts, selecting a few to be performed before a small select audience, who will make the ultimate adjudication by vote.

'REVUE FRANÇAISE DE MUSIQUE.' Much interesting matter is to be found in the bi-monthly Revue française de musique, of which M. Calvocoressi has recently become co-editor with M. Léon Vallas. The issue for March 25 contains articles on Schreker's Opera, 'Der ferne Klang' (Le Son lointain), and on the moral of the 'Cas Rust' (by M. Calvocoressi, who has already expatiated on the same subject in our columns), and an interesting example of composition by Emile Riadis, an Oriental musician with Western education.

The Vicar of St. John's, Carlisle (the Carlisle Journal tells us), in moving the adoption of the past year's accounts, said:

"About £9 was saved through not paying the choir-boys, and the result had been most satisfactory."

'The note of satisfaction in the choir-boys' voices is said to be very touching.'—Punch.

GIUSEPPE BUONAMICI (1846-1914).

[A brief notice of the death of this esteemed musician appeared in our April number. He died at Florence on March 18, at the age of sixty-eight.—ED., M. T.]

All who came under the spell and charm of the sunniest-natured, most modest and lovable of artists will deplore the loss of one of Italy's foremost and greatest pianists—Giuseppe Buonamici.

As a man he will be remembered with that genuine affection which he possessed the gift of inspiring in so rare a degree; and as an artist by the simple sincerity of that useful life-work which came so suddenly to an end on March 18, at his native city of Florence.

As early as 1860, while still a pupil of his uncle, Giovanni Ceccherini, he made his first public appearance at the Teatro Niccolini. But it was to the quick discernment of Madame Hillebrand (Jessie Laussot), the helpful patroness and friend of so many musicians, that he owed that early encouragement and serious preparation which brought him into life-long contact with two great masters of the pianoforte.

One of a brotherhood of enthusiastic young students (among whom are to be numbered Sgambati and our own pioneer-musician, the late Walter Bache) which was fortunate enough to enjoy the benefit of Madame Hillebrand's interest and advice, Buonamici had the inestimable advantage of the tuition and intimate friendship of Franz Liszt and Hans von Bülow.

That his talent and exceptional pianistic gifts secured early recognition in Germany is placed beyond doubt by the fact that when Bülow resigned his position at the Conservatorium at Munich, Buonamici was chosen as his successor, and the young Florentine, thus becoming a colleague of his master, Rheinberger, held the chief professorship of the pianoforte in that School for the following three years.

Whether a threatened paralysis of the left hand (caused by over-practice, but eventually cured) or an attack of that mal du pays to which your Tuscan is peculiarly liable induced him to reject enticing offers and settle down finally at Florence, just when a brilliant career as a pianist seemed open to him, I know not.

But to Bülow, who was as fond as he was proud of his pupil, the decision was without doubt a great disappointment. Although Buonamici's performances were from first to last uniformly and deservedly successful in his own country—in which his appearances were at one time frequent—as well as in Germany (Weimar, Kiel, Baden-Baden, Mannheim, Munich, &c.), his natural characteristics were not of that stuff to enable him to live happily in the perpetual publicity and rivalry which are but part and parcel of a virtuoso's career. The inevitable ruffings and irritations of the travelling artist's life were thoroughly repugnant to him, although he had little or no experience of them; and however willingly he played in private, in later years at least his retiring disposition needed strong persuasion before it allowed him to exhibit his powers in public.

A fascinating warmth of expression, combined with an exquisite ease and delicacy of execution, were striking features of his very individual style. His exceptional beauty of tone and touch invariably reminded me more vividly of Rubinstein—when that master was not in the 'Ercles vein'—than of any other eminent pianist I have yet heard; while a total absence of anything like effort—still less of affectation—made the personal charm of his playing complete. Buonamici performed Liszt and Chopin to perfection, and as a reverential and thoughtful interpreter of Beethoven he certainly excelled.

On his return from Germany he accepted the principal professorship of his instrument at the R. Istituto Musicale, also undertaking the directorship of the Società Cherubini, a choral Society originally founded and conducted by Madame Hillebrand. Further, the Società del Trio, of which the excellent concerts became the chief artistic events at Florence for a number of years, was formed by him, with the co-operation of Chiostrì (violin) and Sbolci (violoncello), and continued until quite recently, with the assistance of Faini and other prominent local professors.

Buonamici's growing fame as a teacher continued to the last to attract a large number of pupils—a very considerable number of whom were English and American students—from all parts of Europe. These, with many young Italian musicians to whom he gave of his best, are now mourning the loss of their accomplished master. The cordial friendship which existed between Liszt and Buonamici has already been touched upon. Wagner also, in whose house he was always a welcome guest, had a particularly warm regard for him, as the following incident, which took place at the first performance of 'Parsifal,' may well bear witness.

When the curtain fell at the end of the first Act, Buonamici, whom chance had placed under the composer's box, stood up to join in the general ovation. Wagner saw him, and immediately called out, 'When did you come?' 'I'll tell you later on ;

listen to the applause, master!' 'No, no ; you come up here at once,' was the reply. Without taking heed of anything that was going on around him, Wagner leaned over and, assisted by one or two spectators below, pulled Buonamici, coram populo, into his box, in which his young friend remained during the rest of the performance.

The deceased artist was also a busy editor, who issued many valuable editions of pianoforte music, including Beethoven's Sonatas, Studies on special difficulties in Beethoven, 'Biblioteca del Pianista,' &c. His latest publication was an interesting Suite of transcriptions of quaint pieces by an old, forgotten Italian composer, Azzolino Bernardino Della Ciala di Siena, and published by Bratti (Florence). These effective old-world pieces will well repay the attention of advanced students.

It remains to be said that the always-welcome pianist visited London four times, viz., in 1887, 1890, 1892, and 1893, and on each occasion his public appearances were of the most successful and gratifying kind.

On the first of these occasions, he played Beethoven's Choral Fantasia at a concert given by the short-lived London Musical Society, on June 24, in St. James's Hall, under my direction, and his masterly performance of Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto was enthusiastically applauded at a Philharmonic Concert on June 5, 1890.*

The ranks of those musicians who had the good fortune to be brought under the personal influence of Liszt and Bülow are rapidly thinning, and these few words of tribute to the memory of 'Beppe' are penned in the sad knowledge of the irreparable loss of a true artist and lovable friend, with whom I shared some of the happiest times that life can give.

THE SEMIBREVE CANTO FERMO IN STRICT COUNTERPOINT.

By C. H. KITSON.

In a recent paper read before the Musical Association, Mr. F. Corder adversely criticised the use of a semibreve Canto Fermo in the study of strict counterpoint, chiefly on the ground of its alleged unrhhythmic nature. Dr. C. W. Pearce, in his address before the Royal College of Organists on January 20, replies to this criticism by saying that the semibreves should be grouped into duple or triple rhythm, thus :

Such a view is quite possible and practicable in uncombined counterpoint, except in the fifth species. But in combined counterpoint it is open to serious objection, as liable to give a false impression of the place and purpose of the semibreve Canto Fermo.

Now the real purpose of strict counterpoint is to teach a student to compose in the 'strict style,' that is, in the style of the polyphonic period. Two objections to this view will at once be raised : (1) That the modes are not used ; (2) That the composition of this period exhibits no use of a uniform semibreve Canto Fermo.

* Not July 5, as stated in last number, p. 247.

As regards point (1), it need only be said that it would be much better if the counterpoint were modal as it originally was. As regards point (2), it is quite true that the semibreve Canto Fermo is not used as a constant factor in the music of the polyphonic period, nor indeed in that of any period. But to work with a semibreve Canto Fermo is purely technical, and if once the student sees how to apply this technique, the matter is at once elucidated. It is a great pity that in examinations the study of strict counterpoint is never taken beyond this technical stage. Now let us explain the matter in detail. As the term 'chord' was unknown in the polyphonic period, it was impossible to teach technique by studying one kind of chord at a time, as we do in harmony. Counterpoint is an anterior system, in which the method was horizontal. Thus the only method possible was to teach one sort of movement at a time, e.g., the five orders of counterpoint. The theorist therefore looks up all the examples of one kind of movement or another and can find in the music of the period, and frames his rules accordingly; and he finds that the semibreve covers all the kinds of movement that can be found. It is, therefore, artificial, and acts as a sort of prop for elementary study, just as the figured bass in harmony. But there is this important point to remember, that in the music that it thus serves as the determining factor of analysis, the semibreve covers two accents and not one.

An examination of the Kyrie of Palestrina's 'Missa Eterna Christi Munera' will illustrate the matter, and also introduce some difficulties that will require elucidation:

Ex. 2.

Take first of all the cases that present no difficulty:

- (1) Is an example of first and second species.
- (2) " " first, second, and fourth species.
- (3) " " first and third species.
- (4) " " first, second, fourth, and fifth species.
- (5) " " first and second species.

It will at once be seen why two chords in a bar in strict counterpoint are permissible.

At (6) we apparently get first species in minims, and at (7) first and second species in minims and crotchets. But this is not actually so, so far as procedure is concerned. In applying the technique:

- (1) All semibreves follow first species principle.
- (2) All minims follow second species principle.
- (3) All crotchets follow third species principle.
- (4) All syncopated minims follow fourth species principle.

Now, it is agreed that two chords in a bar may be used. When a semibreve Canto Fermo is used, the two chords necessarily have one note in common. But when this ceases to be a constant factor, the principle of two chords remains, but it is not necessary that they have a note in common. This explains (6) and (7).

It will be seen that the Alto uses at (7) the familiar florid idiom and is used in scholastic counterpoint over the semibreve.

It is also very important to remember that a prepared discord and its resolution almost invariably occur on a strong accent followed by a weak one, e.g., not See (2), (8), and (9).

If we adopted Dr. Pearce's principle we should produce:

Ex. 3.

Whereas the true rhythm is:

Ex. 4.

But, someone will say, this example from Palestrina is not florid counterpoint. That is true. It is an indiscriminate use of all the species, adapted to the needs of composition. The important thing is that semibreves still follow the first species principle, minims the second species principle, &c. The accents move in minims and not in semibreves. Some further difficulties remain to be removed. At (10) we have a repeated note. The words demand this: The equivalent in scholastic counterpoint is .

Again, repeated minims = semibreves, and repeated crotchets = minims. The important point to see is that whether a semibreve be present or not the idiom of the parts remains just as if it were there, and the parts follow the principles, harmonic and melodic, of that prop.

Next, let us proceed to show the working of the principle. Let us take first a short example of ordinary scholastic counterpoint with the accents marked in accordance with the historic basis:

Ex. 5.

The rhythm is :

and not :

The next stage of scholastic study should be that in which we apply these principles, without the prop of a semibreve Canto Fermo :

It will be seen that all the parts obey the rules of melodic idiom of florid counterpoint, and that they move just as if a semibreve Canto Fermo were there as a constant factor. It will also be seen how utterly wrong it would be to imagine the rhythm to be :

The next stage of study is composition in the strict style. All that need be said here is that the writer has proved time after time that such a course as has been outlined above results in a student's being able to write accurately in the manner of the 16th century, so far as technique is concerned.

If it be argued that it is of no use to learn a dead language, then strict counterpoint should be abolished, and something else should be invented to take its place. But we must carefully guard against attempting to make strict counterpoint what it was never intended to be, and never can be. The semibreve Canto Fermo is a perfectly intelligible thing, if understood aright. It is simply a prop, which has finally to be eliminated as a constant factor. But it is most important to remember that it represents two accents. Thus it is that in his chapter on counterpoint on a chorale in his treatise on counterpoint, Sir Frederick Bridge says : 'The Chorale is usually written in minims, and may be regarded as a part in the second species with the remaining parts in florid counterpoint.' That is to say that the minims represent accents (two in a bar), and the florid parts use the idioms of a bar over two minims and not one, e.g. :

To put it another way, if in strict counterpoint we combine the first, second, and fourth species, we produce a series of chords moving in minims :

Each of the bars in the above contains a semibreve, and it will be realised that it is the harmony of Tallis's Canon. But it would be quite wrong to regard the minims either as divisions of beats, or as lasting over two beats. Probably all the trouble about strict counterpoint would disappear if teachers and examiners gave more attention to it in the second stage, with either a florid part as Canto Fermo, or with a second species part as Canto Fermo.

- (1.) i.e., Third species principle, already learnt with prop of semibreve Canto Fermo.
- (2.) It is allowable to change the harmony on the fourth crotchet.

Here the minim Canto Fermo is rightly regarded as moving in grouped accents—U

The important points are :

- (1.) That the strong and weak minims form together a bar of scholastic counterpoint, and not two bars.
- (2.) That the bar contains two accents, and not merely one.

The right view of the semibreve Canto Fermo is that it represents two accents (or three in triple time) in all combined work, and in any case where the fifth species is used.

TEACHERS' CONDITIONS IN WESTERN CANADA.

BY LIONEL KINGSLEY.

The sphere of music in Canada can be divided, roughly, into two zones, that of the East and that of the West. Neither of these is concerned with what the other does. The East, which shelters the old and quasi-old cities of Montreal, Quebec, Toronto, and Ottawa, stalks along in a high atmosphere of grand opera in the season, classical concerts, and fine orchestras. Musicians abound in the avenues of the great cities, and competition is as keen as in Europe, for not only do the highly-trained students of the Continent emigrate thither, but it is a convenient outlet for the surplus talent of the United States. In the East there is a considerable amount of culture, and where culture is in evidence the condition of the fine arts may often be found financially to be in a parlous condition. So, for musical purposes, the East will be dismissed from the scope of this article, for it contains passable imitations of the overcrowded musical cities of the Old World.

Certainly it is not in the East that a man, going to the Dominion to carve out a career, or a living—to be more temperate in expression,—as a teacher, is likely to gain recognition and success. It is to the middle of Canada that we must look, to that part commonly known as Western Canada, the great provinces of Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan. The delightful province of British Columbia, which is much better suited, climatically, to the Englishman, must be ruled out, for the market-place of music there is crowded to excess at present. A decade hence it may offer openings for teachers.

The newcomer, when he enters the great St. Lawrence River and passes the smiling hamlets on the banks, and hears the bells ringing from innumerable little churches stuck away in the hills or sheltering close down upon the shores, must put regretfully behind him the hope of participating in the musical work of cities cultured in the art, and resign himself to the inland places and townships where music is still, necessarily, in its infancy. His task will be to uplift the rough settlers of the West.

Taking Manitoba, for instance, whither many English teachers have gone of late years, the newcomer must not cherish too fine ideals; for the chief place in this province is engaged in the perpetual boosting of real estate. It loves this better than the finer things of life. This city is Winnipeg, known among the Indians as 'Dirty Water.' It is very material, contains about 200,000 people, and is a large, straggling capital stuck in the middle of a cheerless flat prairie. It appears to have, at present, all the musicians it can assimilate. The talented man coming there will be told that there is always room at the top—that chilly place where one usually gets all the stormy winds which blow: but he will find that there will be little inducement to toil there, and, after all, a musician must live. The citizens of Winnipeg love better the click of knives and forks in the 'quick-lunch' cafés than the music of the spheres.

There is a musical set at Winnipeg which is very powerful; it is feminine and dominating. It is known as the Women's Musical Club. It may be said that such clubs are to be found in many of the larger Canadian towns. These clubs certainly do a great deal to foster the purest of the arts, but they rather tend to become cliquey, a close preserve. They offer a welcome to the feminine newcomer, be she teacher or gifted amateur, but the unhappy male is barred. He is penalised by virtue of his sex, and must remain, unhappily, in the outer darkness away from the shining lights of musical society. So man in Canada is handicapped; and the woman teacher starts with a certain advantage, for, naturally, to be a member of one of these clubs is to come into contact with those people who can influence pupils and resultant fees.

There is a men's musical club—the Clef Club—but being essentially a Bohemian one, it offers no scope to the man who has to earn his living. Decidedly woman has usurped the high places in music in this great outpost of the Empire. The Women's Musical Club gives a concert each week or fortnight in the 'season,' and members are invited to furnish the programme. But truth to say these concerts could be of greater musical value. At present many of these clubs are mutual admiration societies, and inside and outside criticisms are barred. It is possible to hear at these recitals the classics and romanticists played as correctly and icily well as ever the heart of pedant could desire. Sometimes as a relief an artist bird of passage is invited to play or sing. Cadmon, the composer and collector of Indian melodies, Schumann-Heink, and others of equal fame have been stars at these concerts.

The teacher new coming to Winnipeg (and he should come a few months before the winter sets in, so that he may become known socially) must give his opening concert and be prepared to lose money by it. Then he will settle down to the usual drudgery of seeking pupils. He will find little good in advertising. He should come equipped with introductions. If a singer he may secure a church appointment ranging anywhere up to a hundred pounds a year. This will pay his current expenses, so that all he takes in his studio will be net profit. If he has no introductions or appointment he will find the task he has set himself a very weary one. And there have been quite a number of young, ardent, musical hearts broken in the land of the primitives, the mighty West. He will find that he has to compete with all classes of teachers whose fees range anywhere from a pound to a shilling a lesson. The 'pound people' are very old established, and have so secured the cream of the pupils. They are exceedingly well entrenched, musically. Some make handsome incomes, indeed, and camp luxuriously in the hot season with the rich on the lakes or in the mountains.

The newcomer will find a formidable competition in a local Conservatoire, which is a chartered company run on business lines. All in this establishment is cut and dried. Godowsky's name is on the prospectus as patron and supervisor, and much play is made with his personality. This Conservatoire is built up on a foundation of paper examinations. As everyone in the city plays the piano, after a fashion, the teachers in this school are well employed. But there is no further demand for them at present.

Leaving Winnipeg the only other large town is Brandon, where there is also a Conservatoire besides other teachers. Apart from these two cities this immense province has little to offer the earnest man. If he goes into the small towns he must be prepared to earn little, and even that little in a fluctuating way, allied to a climate of the utmost severity. He must be content to move in circles whose highest outlook on music is founded on barbaric rag-time. He must gaze from windows and survey soul-depressing elevators and stores with the architecture of boxes, roads quagmires of mud. Intellectual companions he will have none, for those who live in the townships are traders with never a soul above the dollar, the crisp sound of which is the finest music in their ears. And this, to the temperamental man, will be soul-destroying, disheartening.

Moving on to Alberta and Saskatchewan he will find much the same conditions as in Manitoba. Edmonton, the capital of Alberta, is a fine city striding the hills, but music is overdone here. The number of studios opened during the past year is out of all proportion to the demand. No pianoforte teachers are required for many a long day. There may be a little more opening for qualified vocal teachers, for there are as many quacks, in proportion, ruining voices in Canada as there are in the more sophisticated European musical centres. But the climate of the West is so dry that good voices are the exception. Those who wish to sing and can afford the luxury usually go to Europe to learn. Those who cannot dig up the requisite dollars for such an expensive cruise perforce have to linger on among the inefficient, the voice destroyers.

The outlook for teachers in Canada, then, must be taken as a bad one. Of course there is an element of luck in this as in everything else. One person succeeds where another will not. Personality may count, and attract the favour of people who can do the owner much good. There may be prizes to the adventurous.

One citizen who has moved about a great deal in Europe said to the writer: 'We are always glad to welcome men of talent—men of personality—here. We like to have them with us. They assist in the development of the country. They are for our good. But if they are looking for a financial success it is a different thing.' And, after all, as already remarked, a musician has to live, and wishes to do so with some æsthetic enjoyment.

So rule Canada at present out of practical politics so far as it is of use to the surplus teachers of the Old World. It needs agriculture—music culture will come later.

The hope in Manitoba is a Conservatoire of Music with State endowment, so that the interests of music may be served without regard to profit. But little headway has been made in this direction. As one of the Cabinet said to the writer, 'There are no dollars in it'; and when expostulation was made he continued, 'I am simply bullheaded about music, don't know a thing about it.' So, any little efforts which have been made have died practically stillborn. At least they have brought forth no children.

Each provincial capital to the West needs its State Academy; then there will be hope for the teachers and true art in Canada.

The open competition for Mr. Clifton Cooke's £100 Vocal Scholarship will be held at 20, Bloomsbury Street, W.C., on Saturday, May 23; entries close May 18. Extra cash prizes are offered by Messrs. J. B. Cramer & Co., and Messrs. G. Schirmer. The adjudicators will be Mr. C. P. Landi and Mr. Clifton Cooke.

DR. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS'S SYMPHONY.

At the last of Mr. F. B. Ellis's concerts given at Queen's Hall on March 27, the one new work of first-rate importance, 'A London Symphony,' in four movements, by Dr. R. Vaughan Williams, was played by the Queen's Hall Orchestra under the capable direction of Mr. Geoffrey Toye.

Several of our composers have had something to say about London life. The two works which naturally come to mind are Sir Alexander Mackenzie's 'London day by day,' and Sir Edward Elgar's 'Cockaigne Overture.' But Dr. Vaughan Williams views his subject from a different angle. Though he sometimes touches upon their pictorial point of view (he cannot evade the Westminster chimes, and the Cockney boy with his mouth-organ comes straggling into the middle of the Scherzo), it is not this sort of picture-making with which he is most concerned. Indeed, delightful as we know it to be in a short work of the 'Cockaigne' type, a symphony taking fifty minutes to play and built upon such a series of scenes and portraits, would necessarily become a hopelessly inconglomerate affair. Somewhere behind all the daily incidents, behind the extravagant enthusiasms for new amusements from Paris or New York, and the equally extravagant enthusiasms after seriousness, behind the incongruities of stately medieval buildings jostled by the latest enormities in architecture reared in concrete blocks upon steel girders, behind the cries of the newsboys and the voices of the preachers, whether of the churches or Hyde Park, there is something steady and constant which unites the London of to-day with the London of Samuel Pepys, and which the Londoner owns often subconsciously as the spirit of the place.

It seems to be that which Dr. Vaughan Williams has tried to get at in his music, and though at one point in the first movement he breaks out into a preposterous ragtime tune, and again in the slow movement works in the calls of lavender sellers and other street traders, though the Scherzo suggests the bustle of the streets at night and, if we like, we may find the flashing sky-signs in certain sudden points of bright colour, all these things are only excrescences on the surface. There is a big impulse, a big rhythmic line underlying the whole design which makes it a real symphony and a real reflection of the London spirit, a spirit which we feel all the more strongly because it is disguised beneath a myriad attractions and distractions.

The Symphony begins very softly, and its opening theme, though apparently purely introductory, is the principal motive of the whole. We find references to it in a number of the most divergent episodes of the first movement, and it comes back at the end to close in the whole design with the sombre atmosphere which is always ready to shroud the brilliance of London. There is a good deal of sombreness in the Symphony. The first movement is the only one which ends in a blaze of light; the slow movement has been described as 'Bloomsbury in a fog,' but it is not a black fog. The accompanying chords shifting up adjacent degrees of the scale do not hide the tender beauty of the melody given out by the cor anglais, which leads to a number of clearly defined though always rather subdued episodes. The Scherzo (Nocturne) with two Trios presents a very full canvas, yet not a crowded one; it is full of vigorous life, of moving figures, of little dialogues between individual instruments. It has some harsh details, especially in the second Trio, but finally the lights go out; London sleeps for a few hours between 'closing time' and the running of the workmen's trains, and then in that quiet interval the composer gives his thoughts free play, and begins to build up the splendid poem of his Finale.

Dr. Vaughan Williams thinks about it all much as Walt Whitman, whose words he has so often set, would have thought about it. The Finale begins with a passionate outburst, followed by a solemn march, the tread of many feet through the centuries in London streets; once the reckless climax of the march nearly reproduces (probably unconsciously) a passage in the first movement of the 'Sea Symphony,' and from it springs a more reflective, church-like passage. London would mean little without its churches. Last of all, the opening theme is built to a solemn climax, such a climax as the dome of St. Paul's shows against the eastern dawn. The busy life will begin again through many another day and year and century, and will grow the more entrancing the deeper we look beneath its surface.

SOME MUSICAL EPITAPHS.

By C. EDGAR THOMAS.

The study of epitaphs is a most fascinating and absorbing one, and one that is as interesting and instructive as it is captivating. A desire to perpetuate the memory of the departed being natural to all mankind, the practice of placing inscriptions over their graves has found favour among all people in all ages. Many epitaphs should find no place on sepulchral monuments, inasmuch as they are not really epitaphs at all, their interest and value lying more in a literary direction than in the persons whose memories they ostensibly perpetuate. Again, probably no form of literary composition is more difficult to execute effectively than a really good epitaph; while seeing that so much has to be concentrated into a comparatively small space, it is perfectly obvious that the epitaph-writer requires the very essence of literary acumen.

Musicians in general have ever lent themselves admirably to the epitaph-writer's art; and the many sagely wise, humorous, witty, and epigrammatic verses that have been written on them have contributed in no small measure to the romance of graveyard literature.

An early musical epitaph is that on the Trumpeter of Charles II., one Snow, which dates from 1680:

Thaw every breast, melt every eye with woe,
Here's dissolution by the hand of Death!
To dirt, to water, turn'd the fairest Snow:
O! the king's trumpeter hath lost his breath.

Henry Purcell has been the recipient of a singularly brief inscription in the Westminster Abbey:

Here lies Henry Purcell, Esq., Who left this life and is gone to that blessed Place where only his own Harmony can be exceeded.
Died Nov. 21, 1695, aged 37 years.

John Brimleys, sometime organist of St. Mary's Chapel, Durham, has been immortalised by a tablet in that edifice, which dates from 1576:

John Brimleys bodye here doth ly,
Who prayesyd God with honde and voyse;
By musyckes heauenly harmonie
Aul myndes he maid in God reioyce.
Hys soul into ye heauens is lyft
To prayse him stil yt gaue ye gyfte.

The next epitaph concerns Thomas Tallis, an eminent musician, and Gentleman of the Chapel to Edward VI. and Mary. It is interesting to note that his salary for this office was sevenpence-halfpenny per day. Subsequently he received the appointment of organist to 'Good Queen Bess,' and together with a pupil of his, named Bird, he published a large collection of hymns. His epitaph dates from the year of his death, 1585:

He serv'd long time in chappel with grete prayse
Fower sovereygnes reygnes, (a thing not often seen)
I mean kyng Henrie, and Prince Edwardes daies, Queene Marie, and Elizabeth our Queene.

At Llanfyllantwthyl is this verse to the memory of Meredith Morgan, an organ-blower, in connection with whom an amusing anecdote is related:

Under this stone lies Meredith Morgan
Who blew the bellows of our church organ.
Tobacco he hated, to smoke most unwilling,
Yet never so pleased as when pipes he was filling.
No reflection on him for rude speech could be cast,
Though he gave our old organ many a blast!
No puffer was he, though a capable blower;
He could blow double C, but now he's a note lower.

It is related that when Handel was playing at a large town before a crowded audience, Morgan was blowing the organ, and after the applause which greeted the end of the first part had subsided, he peeped round the side of the organ and remarked: 'There, that is just what I expected, we played that march first rate!' 'We!' replied the great organist, 'what had you to do with it?' Morgan made no reply, and the second part commenced. Half way through, the force began to die down, and Handel signalled for more wind to be pumped. Round the corner came Morgan's head again, 'All right, I know, but is it we?' The fortissimo decreased as the wind was rapidly giving out, so in despair the organist exclaimed, 'Yes, yes, we, of course; pump like fury, man!'

Handel's own epitaph in Westminster Abbey is a model of conciseness and modesty. It simply and unostentatiously states:

To melt the soul, to captivate the ear
(Angels such melody might deign to hear),
To anticipate on earth the joys of heaven,
'Twas Handel's task: to him that power was given.

From Youlgreave, Derbyshire, comes this epitaph on Samuel Taylor, who died in 1848, at the age of seventy-two years:

To the down Bow of Death
His forte gave way,
All the graces in sorrow were drown'd;
Hallelujah Crescendo
Shall be his glad lay
When Da' Capo the Trumpet shall sound.

At North Stoneham, Wiltshire, this curious verse may still be seen, on a singer named John Spearing:

Here beneath this cold stone Lies Harmonious John.
Let not antient Songs claim
To themselves all the fame.
Comparison leaves no room.
Their harmonious Powers
Built but Walls and high Towers;
We've raised with Musick
This Toom.

An 18th century musician of Wolverhampton was chiefly remarkable for his inimitable execution on the violin and his whole-hearted contempt for the riches and good things of this life. Charles Claudius Phillips was a Welshman by birth, and after experiencing the 'slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,' he died in 1732, 'a fiddler.' His mural verse is as follows:

Exalted soul, thy various sounds could please
The love-sick virgin & the gouty ease,
And jarring crowds, like old Amphion, move
To beauteous order and harmonious love.
Now rest in peace, till Angels bid thee rise
And join thy Saviour's Concert in the skies.

Another 'fiddler' lies buried in a Suffolk churchyard, above whose remains are these two lines :

*Stephen and Time are now both even ;
Stephen beat time, now Time's beat Stephen.*

A good specimen of a punning epitaph comes from Chester, where there is a verse, dated 1645, to William Lawes :

*Concord in conquer'd ; in this ern there lies
The master of great Music's mysteries ;
And in it is a riddle like the cause,
Will Lawes was slain by those whose Wills are Lawes.*

This worthy, an 'excellent musician' and a commissary in the Royalist army, met his death at the hands of the Parliamentarians at the siege of Chester.

In the fine old parish church of Wakefield is a tablet commemorating a former organist of the edifice, which reads :

In memory of Henry Clementshaw.

*Upwards of 50 years organist of this Church,
Who died May 7, 1821, aged 68.*

*Now like an organ, robb'd of pipes & breath,
Its keys and stops are useless made by death,
Tho' mute and motionless in ruins laid,
Yet when rebuilt by more than mortal aid,
This instrument new voiced and tuned, shall raise
To God, its builder, hymns of endless praise.*

The inscription on Charles Dibdin, the poet and composer, strikes more a personal than a professional note. It may be seen in St. Martin's Church, St. Pancras :

*His form was of the manliest beauty,
His heart was kind & soft,
Faithful on earth he did his duty,
But now he's gone aloft.*

A musical epitaph of the 'narrative' type records the death of the wife of a violinist, and also the fact that he had become so much attached to her that he also yielded to the grim tyrant on the same day. This inscription is in Flixton Churchyard, and reads :

To the memory of John Booth, of Flixton, who died 16th March, 1778, aged 43 years ; on the same day and within a few hours of the death of Hannah his wife, who was buried with him in the same grave.

*Reader, have patience, for a moment stay,
Nor grudge the tribute of a friendly tear,
For John, who once made all our village gay,
Has taken up his clay-cold lodging here.
Suspended now, his fiddle lies asleep,
That once with musick us'd to charm the ear,
Not for his Hannah long reserv'd to weep,
John yields to fate with his companions dear.*

*So tenderly he loved his dearer part,
His fondness could not bear a stay behind ;
And Death through kindness seem'd to throw the dart
To ease his sorrow, as he knew his mind.*

*In cheerful labours all their time they spent,
Their happy lives in length of days acquir'd ;
But hand-in-hand to Nature's God they went,
And just lay down to sleep when they were tir'd.*

*The relics of this honest, faithful pair
One little space of mother earth contains.
Let earth protect them with a mother's care,
And constant verdure grace her for her pains.*

*The pledges of their tender love remain,
For seven fine children bless'd their nuptial state.
Behold them, neighbours ! nor behold in vain,
But heal their sorrows and their lost estate.*

(To be continued.)

The annual prize distribution at York Minster Choir School, of which Mr. G. A. Scaife is headmaster, took place on Easter Monday. The unique series of examination successes achieved by pupils of this School continues without interruption, Conan Shaw and Cecil W. Hamilton being conspicuous among successful candidates in the Trinity College of Music and College of Preceptors examinations.

Church and Organ Music.

OLD ITALIAN CHURCH ORGANS.

By C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS.

With the rise of opera the development of the organ in Italy was arrested, and in many churches there remain very ancient examples that are still in use. I propose to describe some of those to which I obtained access : my impression is that hundreds of these old instruments exist, while many have been replaced by new organs of nearly as antiquated a character as their predecessors.

On the other hand, I often met with instruments that were fairly up to date ; but none of them had reached the degree of development to which we are accustomed in England, Germany, France, and Belgium. Into the details of these I do not propose to enter.

With the submersion, so to speak, of the organ, the profession of organist seems to have lost caste. I became aware of this through an incident that greatly amused me. A member of the Italian Parliament, with whom I became acquainted in an hotel at Torre del Greco, being interested in musical matters and hearing that I could play the organ, wished to introduce me to a young friend of his who was starting a career as priest, composer, and teacher of plainsong. Before bringing about the meeting he told me confidentially that he had explained to his friend that an English organist took a high position in the musical profession and in social life, and he therefore need not feel that his dignity would be in any way compromised by meeting me !

In Northern Italy I met organists with high artistic standards ; capable classical players. But alongside them there still flourish those of the kind described by Mendelssohn in a well-known letter, and these seem to be in the majority. The priests encourage trivial organ-playing to attract the congregation, but in a place where I was given free use of a fairly adequate modern organ I found that the music of Mendelssohn, Bach, and Guilmant which I played became extremely popular with the peasantry.

I make a selection from the old organs of which I find notes in my diary. I made no special search, and often discovered them by looking into a church in the course of a walk.

San Ambrosio, a village near Rapallo. The organ is only played at festas. The priest told me that they depended on the kindness of musical friends, and suggested that I should climb up the hill and play at their next festa. But finding that he wanted very trivial music to please his congregation, I made an excuse for declining.

Although it was built in 1874, this organ would rank as very antiquated with us. It has one keyboard and twenty-four half-stops : that is, each stop is divided into treble and bass portions, to allow of solo and accompaniment on one keyboard. This arrangement was not unknown on old English organs, and is still the rule in Spain, even on the largest instruments.

The San Ambrosio registers are not controlled by draw-stops, but by wooden levers, all of which are on the right-hand side of the keyboard. To make a stop sound the player draws its lever towards him and latches it. When released from the latch it returns to its 'off' position by means of a spring. There is about one octave of pedals, and the Principale (our Open Diapason) is Spezzato.*

* This is a common device, even in recently built organs. The Open diapason pipes serve for both manual and pedal, an extra octave being added to them below the manual compass, and the upper pedals overlapping the lower manual pipes.

The pedals rise from back to front at an angle of some twenty-five degrees, rendering it impossible to play with the heel

Amongst the stops is a Vox humana, coupled to a Tremolo, but the term is here applied to the stop that we call the Voix célestes. There is also a set of bells. The bellows are blown by a winch-like arrangement, which raises the feeders.

The tone of the 8-ft. and 4-ft. pipes is good, but like nearly all old Italian organs, directly one adds the higher stops the instrument becomes screamy.

Levanto, between Genoa and Spezia: Parish Church. The organ was built in 1826. The pedals are set at a sharp angle from back to front, and like those of San Ambrosio, can only be played with the toes. I found, in fact, that they were usually arranged thus in this part of Italy. They are one and a-half octaves in compass, with E as the lowest note, and the Principale is Spezzato. The lowest octave is 'short.' I shall refer to this feature more in detail later. The single keyboard ends with E as its lowest note. There are about twenty half-stops, controlled by levers moving sideways and latching. Reed and flue stops are about equal in number, and there is a set of bells. The tone of the softer flue stops is pleasant, and I accompanied some violin solos on this organ.

Nosarego, a village near Sta. Margherita, to the south of Genoa. The organ was built in 1778 by Tomaso Roccatagliato, of Sta. Margherita. It has one manual and nine pedal keys. The stops are drawn out in the usual way, but they have to be latched, as they return with a spring. The manual has C as its lowest note, while that of the pedal is E. The short octaves of manual and pedal are arranged thus:

MANUAL.
KEYS.

SOUNDING.

PEDAL.
KEYS: 9 ONLY.

Seva più bassa...

There is a Vox humana (really a Voix célestes) and a Cornetto, the latter being a Mixture of three ranks. The Principale is Spezzato.

Lucca Cathedral. The organ is said to have been built in 1482 by Lorenzo degli Organi (of whom I have been unable to find any particulars), and repaired by Giuseppe Paoli e figli, of Campo Bisegno, in modern times. The two keyboards must have been recently renovated, for they look quite new. I did not get an opportunity of playing on this instrument. The case closes with massive shutters, ornamented with huge paintings of saints both inside and out. The bellows, in the sacristy outside the church, are large, to judge by their case. The twenty-one stops are levers, pulling towards the player and requiring to be latched. They are all on the right-hand side of the keyboards, and are arranged in two columns, one containing the reeds, the other the flue-stops. The pedals are from C to F, one octave and three notes. They are placed under the left half of the manuals. There are three ripieno pedals, a feature to which I shall refer later on. It was very dark, and I had considerable difficulty in making out the details by the light of a tiny candle brought by the verger. I was informed that there were many organs of historical interest in this neighbourhood, but I had not time to investigate further. This organ is supposed to be an important one, and it may be of interest to the reader to see the specification of the stops, as they are typical of Italian organs:

It will be noticed that the second column consists principally of diapason stops piled up on one another to the limit of possible diminution. The Contrabasso is a pedal stop, to judge by the context of a document I read in connection with another organ.

Rome: Sta. Prisca in Aventino. The organ of this convent is in excellent preservation, and is a fine specimen of the positive.* It has iron handles at each end of the case for portage, but the verger told me that it was excessively heavy to carry. The keyboard is at a height that makes it more convenient to stand than to sit while playing, and there are no pedals. It is what would anciently be called a 'little organ': that is to say, its chief foundation stop is of 4-ft. instead of 8-ft. pitch.

'An organ,' says Praetorius, 'if it has a principal of 4-ft. tone on the manual, with or without a pedal of 8-ft. tone, is called an Octave- or Little-Principal-Organ.'†

The form of the Sta. Prisca organ is that of a large chest, surmounted by a second chest shaped like the packing-case of a grand pianoforte standing on its keyboard end. The two chests are separate; the lower contains the bellows, the upper the pipes, keyboard, and mechanism. Wind is led from the lower to the upper part by a trunk, and leakage is avoided by the closeness of fitting combined with the weight of the upper part. The case is of walnut, and the workmanship of an unusually high order. To play the instrument one opens large shutters in the upper case and exposes the pipes and keyboard to view. The compass is three octaves and a fifth, without a short octave, and the lowest note is:

the highest being G. The keys are narrow, and only about two inches long. There are eight little draw-stops, consisting of brass knobs on wires, all being at the right of the keyboard. They are:

1. Principal, 4-ft. (The lowest eight notes are stopped wooden pipes, the next five stopped metal, the rest open metal.)
 2. Octave, 2-ft. This is of wood.
 3. Quint, 1½-ft. (metal).
 4. Octave, 1-ft. (metal).
 5. Twelfth, ¾-ft. (metal).
 6. Octave, ½-ft. (metal).
 7. Octave, ¼-ft. (metal).
 8. Ripieno. (This causes all stops except Nos. 1 and 2 to speak without drawing their knobs. It is the predecessor of the 'Grand jeu' in the harmonium.)
- No. 7 returns at each D to its lowest octave.
No. 5 returns at each G in the same way.
No. 3 returns at its top C to the octave below.

* The Positive is an organ that can be carried in processions, but requires to be 'set down' (positum) when played. The ancient and now obsolete Portative was played while being carried.

† The word 'Principal' in Germany and Italy is always applied to the stop which we call 'Open diapason.' The stop we call 'Principal' is in those countries named 'Octave.'

The scale of the pipes is large, and their feet are unusually short, to save space. There is no wind reservoir; the two wedge-shaped bellows, which rise to an angle of forty-five degrees, are lifted alternately by ropes passing through the bass end of the bellows case. Lead weights supply the pressure: an unusual luxury, for I generally found stones or broken statues used for this purpose. The tone of the Principal and its octave is excellent; when the other stops are added the tone becomes screamy, like that of most Italian organs.

The Abbess of Sta. Prisca, to whom I am much indebted for permission to examine this instrument, introduced me to the organist—one of the nuns. This lady told me that the organ could not be used for accompanying the voices, since its tone was 'troppo acuto'; hence they used a harmonium—of which she evidently had a very poor opinion. The organ is only heard at festas.

The larger pipes have been very much battered and mended. The pitch I found to be $\frac{3}{4}$ -tone below my diapason-normal tuning fork. The sliders, connected with the drawstops by spindles, are pushed in, not pulled out, to make the pipes speak.

The church is very ancient, and has been frequently restored and added to. An inscription on a marble slab near the door records that it was sumptuously decorated and ornamented by Cardinals Justiniani and Casini, and reconsecrated by Pope Clement XII. on October 1, 1728. Most probably therefore the organ dates from this time.

The measurements are:

Height at bass end, 7-ft. 9-in.	Length, 4-ft. 4-in.
Height at treble end, 4-ft. 1-in.	Depth, 2-ft. 11-in.

VII. OF HYMNS AND HYMN-SINGING.

CLERICUS. PHILOHYMNUS. AUCTOR. LECTOR.

Clericus.—Never before have I been shut up in a room with so many as three organists. I rarely see more than one—my own—and he's one too many. At least, he's generally one too many for me! And here I am, smoking the levelling, heart-opening, barrier-breaking pipe with three! The lion and the lamb? Say, rather, a lamb with three lions!

Auctor.—Not a bit of it, reverend and dear sir. But if so, you shall find us the gentlest and tamest of lions. Like Bully Bottom, we will roar you an 'twere any nightingale.

Philo.—Talking of hymns—

Auctor.—Which nobody was, as yet; though I know you well enough to be sure that we soon shall be if you take charge of the conversation.

Lector.—Hymns! Surely they are the small beer of Church music.

Clericus.—Without going so far as to agree with that rather startling simile, I should say that they are things one takes for granted. So long as they are well known and not too long, go with a swing, and are not too archaic as to their music, or doctrinally extreme in any way, surely there is little to be said of them.

Auctor.—When you have been a little longer in the company of Philohymnus you will find that there is a great deal to be said of them, and unless you apply the closure, he'll say it, to the last word. So be warned!

Clericus.—Well, your hobby-horse, like other pets, must be brought out and exercised from time to time; so if our friend feels like a gallop, I for my part am content to be ridden over.

Lector.—I must confess that the subject is one with no allurements for me. I have been an organist for a good many years, and have long since exhausted what interest I ever had in hymn-tunes. Still, I will not interrupt. You may wake me when the last word has been said.

Philo.—There are far too many clergy and organists who are similarly indifferent. If you think this is not so, how do you explain the very scanty consideration given to the subject in the recent newspaper discussion on Church music,—and, indeed, in almost all other similar discussions? When people begin to debate on Church music, you find a multitude of words about the choice of anthem and service music, the tyrant at the console, the everlasting question of Anglican versus Gregorian, the best psalter, the west-end position of choir and organ, and so on. Rarely do you find the hymn-tune receiving its fair share of notice. And yet we English are a hymn-loving people. Fond as we may be of the Psalms, the hymn has a specially warm corner in our affections, perhaps because, as children, we are familiar with both words and music of dozens of hymns long before the Psalms make any appeal to us. But how often do you hear hymn-singing that shows signs of thought or care?

Clericus.—I can answer for my own church, where we most religiously observe the expression marks. If, for example, you could hear our choir sing the last line of 'Abide with me,' with the sudden change from forte to pianissimo at the words 'in death,' and a beautifully graded crescendo to finish with, 'it would, I am sure, move you deeply.'

Philo.—It would move me quickly—out of the building! If that is your idea of care in singing hymns—the management of dynamics, for all the world like a pot-hunting competitive choir out for marks, we are hardly likely to agree. However, I will come back later to this question of performance. My main point, one which I have been longing to deliver myself of as soon as I could get a parson and an organist at my mercy, is this: With all your boasted fondness for hymns, and in spite of the important part they play in your services, comparatively few of you are taking advantage of two fine collections put forth during the past ten years. I allude to the 'English Hymnal' and the 1904 edition of 'Hymns A. & M.' Let me say a few words about the latter to begin with. And I had better point out that what I say must not be construed into an attack on the old 'A. & M.' The mere fact of the proprietors issuing a revised edition is proof of a feeling in influential quarters that something better was needed. Let us be grateful to the old edition, but in our admiration let us not be blind to the fact that in hymnology, as in other things pertaining to the Church and its music, things have moved a bit since 1875, the date of the 'Enlarged and Revised Version.' In spite of grumbles, there can be no doubt that our Church music is much better than it was twenty years ago. We have a higher standard of choir work, a better type of anthem and service setting (though there are still far too many of the 'cheap and easy' variety), and there is a welcome revival in some of the older types of ecclesiastical music—a revival which is going to have an enormous influence on our Church composers of the future. But with all this advance, hymns and hymn-singing are pretty much where they were before the recent awakening. What hymn book do you use?

Clericus.—The old edition of 'A. & M.'

Philo.—Why not the revised edition of 1904?

Clericus.—My dear fellow, I couldn't. I got a copy at once, and glanced through it, and found so many irritating changes in both words and music that I gave up the idea of using it.

Philo.—As a conscientious parish priest, with some responsibilities in the matter of public worship, you have of course since then carefully examined the book apart from these changes?

Clericus.—As a matter of fact, I can't say that I have.

Philo.—Then I may also take it for granted that you have not considered the changes themselves to see how far they were justifiable?

Clericus.—You may. They simply annoyed me, and I dismissed the thing from my mind.

Philo.—I admit that many of them annoyed me, and indeed some of them do now. But reminding myself that the revision was the work of men whose position in the ecclesiastical and musical world commanded respect, I managed to find time to go through the book in as detached a manner as possible. The result was that I speedily came to the conclusion that the 1904 revision was an enormous advance on its predecessor, and ten years' further acquaintance has deepened the conviction. Also, I have no doubt whatever that the same conclusion would be arrived at by the majority of clergy and organists, if only they would judge the book as a whole, instead of by some—at first—irritating details. And how unimportant were most of these things that annoyed you! I know what they were, because I have so often heard them discussed. Here is a typical example. You found 'Hark! the herald angels sing' with its original version restored. You couldn't sing such a good old English word as 'welkin,' of course. 'Hark!' wrote Wesley:

'Hark! how all the welkin rings!
Glory to the King of kings.'

As good a brace of lines as you can wish for, and much better than:

'Hark! the herald-angels sing
Glory to the new-born King':

which also happens to be incorrect as narrative. It is not for me, a mere organist, to put your reverence right in such things, but as a matter of fact there was only one angel acting as herald, and the subsequent angelic chorus was 'Glory to God in the highest,' of which words Wesley's version is right, and the popular one wrong. In the synopsis of chap. ii. of St. Luke you find: '6. The nativity of Christ. 8. One angel relateth it to the shepherds. 13. Many sing praises to God for it.' Nevertheless, the man in the pew and his wife and family, aided and abetted by the clergy, will go on singing the inferior and incorrect version, not because they think it better—indeed, they won't think about it at all—but for the quite inadequate reason that they are accustomed to it. Here is another passage, the alteration of which caused some heart-burning. In the old edition of 'A. & M.,' in the well-known evening hymn, 'The radiant morn hath passed away,' we find the ridiculous statement that—

'Our life is but a fading dawn,
Its glorious noon, how quickly past.'

Auctor.—Surely that is merely a poetical way of saying that from the moment we are born we begin to draw to our end?

Philo.—That is what the poet meant to say, of course. But it happens that there is one thing that the dawn cannot do: it cannot fade. It must grow, otherwise it would be no true dawn. Further, it has no noon. A 'fading dawn' would be as great a natural phenomenon as a 'rising sunset.' But the expression being made up of two beautiful words, nobody cared much that they happened to contradict one another! The 1904 version has:

'Our life is but an autumn day,' and the 'English Hymnal':

'Our life is but an autumn sun.'

It may seem incredible, but I have heard men and women of ripe age, and not accounted among the mentally decrepit, object to the alteration! More, even after the absurdity of the old version had been admitted, they were still sore at the violence done to the long-familiar words. And because such corrections—and musical changes for the most part of the same kind—annoyed them, the bulk of clergy and organists put lightly on one side the result of years of work by recognised authorities! Am I not right in saying that for a nation of hymn-lovers, we disguise our affection uncommonly well?

Clericus.—But surely, on its musical side, the book contains a lot of unnecessary tinkering with old favourites?

Philo.—There are some small alterations of which even now I fail to see the point. But I am persuaded that the majority are in the nature of improvements. Let us look at some of them. In the matter of the plainsong melodies, to take the oldest first, the gain is immense. Everybody knows that during the past twenty years, thanks to the efforts of the Solesmes Benedictines, and the advantage taken of their labours by the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society, and later by the London Gregorian Choral Association, we are in no doubt as to the rendering of this old music. Over some details, as must be inevitable in a case where ancient manuscripts play a large part, there may be debate, but about the characteristic rhythm of plainsong there can be none. We are as sure of our ground here as we are in any matter affecting modern music. The 1904 edition of 'A. & M.,' like the 'English Hymnal,' has its plainsong melodies set out in the light of the Solesmes discoveries. The thought of how many years must elapse before the corrupt versions popularised by the old 'A. & M.' will be rooted out, makes a plainsong enthusiast despair. Look at the first tune that leaps to my mind, 'Vexilla regis.' In the old notation the first line is:

The modern notation version of the 1904 edition gives us:

The triplet mark is unnecessary, and perhaps dangerous, in that it may lead to attempts to make the pnuma of three notes equal in duration to that of two. It was probably inserted to prevent the use of the rhythm  The 'English Hymnal' gives us the same, minus the triplet mark. Both are as near a transcription as can be given in modern notation. Now, the old 'A. & M.,' being produced at a time when such things as folk-song and plainsong had to behave themselves, and conform to the taste of a respectable age, when sacred music meant Handel and Jackson, and secular music Mendelssohn and Thomas Haynes Bayley, could give us nothing better than:

with dotted notes in all the other lines to match. I admit that this version sounds more modern, but if you modernize the rhythm so as to avoid offence to the unaccustomed ear, why not bring the intervals up to date as well? But even the old 'A. & M.' drew the line at improving the cadence into :

Still, possibly there were many good Victorians who yearned for the leading note! Again, the old edition almost entirely disregarded the modal side of plain-song. The melodies consequently gave an impression of being in a modern scale, with a slight mishap at the cadence. The organ harmonies were almost invariably stiff and stodgy in effect, owing to the use of a separate chord for each note. Nobody would expect a modern florid melody to survive such a method of harmonizing. In the old 'A. & M.', the tune I have just mentioned has not one of its notes used as a passing-note. Compare these harmonizations of the five-note pneuma in the last line, and see how the first goes on wooden legs while the other two have life in their gait :

Now, I am far from throwing stones at the older treatment. It belonged to a time when the popular idea of plainsong was that it had to be crudely and squarely harmonized, just as it was supposed to be effective only when sung ff by many voices. I have heard that there was even a peculiarly nasal method of vocal production employed which became known as the 'plainsong voice'! If the good folk acted according to their lights, let them have due credit. But no one will deny that on this particular subject our lights are better; so why go on perpetuating versions that all recognised authorities agree in condemning as corrupt?

(To be continued.)

The list of music sung at Westminster Cathedral during the past Holy Week and Easter was as usual a wonderful compilation of the finest Church music. English musicians will have noticed with special interest what a large part in the scheme is borne by native polyphonic writers. We have no need to be diffident about our national music when we can point to such fine works as these, and Dr. R. R. Terry is deserving of appreciative thanks for his successful efforts to revive interest in them.

ON ARRANGING FOR THE ORGAN.

By P. C. BUCK.

Professor Buck gave two lectures on this burning topic at the Royal College of Organists. He said that while there might be two opinions about the legitimacy of 'arrangements' of pianoforte or orchestral compositions for the organ, there was no doubt that the practice had in the last twenty-five years become widely prevalent, and had come to stay. Publishers certainly had recognised and risen to the demand for 'arrangements.' While sympathising with those who deplored the present state of licence, his own chief source of dissatisfaction was that organists relied too much on these published arrangements, and did not 'arrange' for themselves. He trusted that by giving some examples of his own methods he might encourage and help others in tackling the difficulties of the problem. To those who objected to arrangements altogether, he would recommend an article by Mr. E. Newman in the Musical Times for July, 1912. Approving of arrangement for pianoforte of Bach's organ works, Mr. Newman seemed hostile to the counter-process, on the general ground that a work conceived in a smaller medium should not be transferred to a larger one. Surely this was too sweeping. If it were true that in an arrangement of an organ work for pianoforte the gain outweighed the loss, the statement must be often true if the words 'pianoforte' and 'organ' changed places, especially as a good deal of old music now classed as pianoforte music was not written for the pianoforte at all, and a large amount of modern 'pianoforte' music was obviously written with one eye on the orchestra, i.e., for a larger medium. But Mr. Newman's main contention was very sound. To take what was written for one instrument and play it as it stood on another meant certain failure; a composer's ideas could not be transplanted unmodified to another medium.

It should be remembered how large a part in pianoforte music was played by the sustaining pedal. In reliance on its help, many notes were written of shorter value than they were meant to sound; and arpeggio passages were intended to have a chord as background.

In pianoforte music, rests were not merely 'silences'; they were also used to give the player time, with the help of the sustaining pedal, to overcome a technical difficulty; or, again, to ensure the detached playing of chords; or, fourthly, to secure a stronger accent for the note or chord following.

A pianist was dependent on thick chords for a fortissimo. In a string quartet, or in pure vocal writing, the 'spacing' of chords was very important; but in loud pianoforte passages the composer was driven to thick chords by mere necessity of tone. Personally he would like to limit all organ chords to six, or even five, notes. In such a piece as the Rachmaninov Prelude, the organist, with his resources of 16-ft. and 4-ft. stops, &c., might leave out of the big chords almost enough notes to compose another piece.

In the matter of pitch also, the notes of a pianoforte piece often needed alteration. Busoni, in his arrangements of Bach's organ works, often, and rightly, transposed an octave higher; just as an organist for the sake of brightness added 4-ft. stops. Conversely, many pianoforte passages should be lowered an octave for the organ; but sometimes the pianoforte passage should be raised in pitch for the organ. Monotony, also, was to be avoided.

On the whole, the pianoforte, being an instrument of 8-ft. pitch, required music of a wide range, and organists should generally transpose pianoforte music an octave lower, especially when the music was itself a pianoforte arrangement of an orchestral score. The work done with the left hand and the pedals was the chief criterion of musicianship in organ arrangements. Some bad faults were (a) to play the pedals all the time, (b) to play the same bass with the pedals and the left hand, to represent the left-hand octaves of the pianist, (c) to use common pianoforte left-hand formulæ represented by a more or less staccato grunt on the pedals on the first and third beats, and a left-hand chord on beats two and four. The root cause of failure laid almost always in the misconception of the middle stave, and the supreme condition of success laid not so much in 'registration' as in a right conception of the work of the left hand. The lecturer begged his hearers to study carefully such good examples of this treatment as some of Best's arrangements, especially the 'Pastorale' from Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio.' As a rule the left-hand part was too 'lumpy,' and of too harmonic a character; it should rather be used as an opportunity for reducing the thickness of the original right-hand chords.

Pianoforte-idiom differed from that of any other instrument; therefore the more essentially pianistic any phrase was the less exactly could it be transplanted to the organ. In an elementary song-accompaniment beginning with an octave for the left-hand followed by a chord, the pianist instinctively put down the sustaining pedal with the octave, a process which flooded the air with reinforcing harmonics. With the organ, in such a case, he recommended soft sustaining chords on the Swell, while the original movement was suggested by the right hand on another manual and the pedals. In dealing with slow repeated chords of accompaniment, where continuity of sound had to be preserved, the same device would do, or else that of tying one or more notes of the chords while repeating the rest. Two questions the organist might ask himself: 'If I were playing this on the piano, to what extent should I instinctively use the sustaining pedal?' and 'If this idea had occurred to the composer in organ-idiom, how would he have written it?' The lecturer then proceeded to give some answers of his own to such problems as:

(1) The semiquaver accompaniment with which the violins enter in the first movement of 'The Unfinished.'

(2) A passage from one of Liszt's pianoforte transcriptions of Wagner.

(3) Brahms's Ballade in G minor.

The staccato passages could be preserved without loss of dignity; the persistent accompaniment figure was important, and a left-hand part had to be invented to fill up obvious gaps, without obscuring the figure. This example was really difficult, and perhaps the whole work was too purely pianistic for successful treatment; at any rate bold and radical change was required. The essential movement had to be preserved, even if some striking features had to be sacrificed.

The lecturer then turned to the consideration of the idiosyncrasies of the organ, and their influence on the transference of musical ideas. There was a complaint that few modern organ compositions gave the player a chance of displaying Diapason tone. Arthur Somervell's Sarabande in D certainly did so. The crescendos were made feasible by coupling Great Diapasons to Oboe and Contrafagotto, or to Oboe with Unison and Sub-octave couplers. This did not spoil the Diapason tone at all.

Dr. Buck played as specimen pieces suitable to the organ in every way Brahms's Ballade in G minor, Jensen's 'Brautgesang,' Scharwenka's 'Preludium,' and Dohnányi's 'March on a Ground Bass.'

Dealing with arranging orchestral music for the organ, he said that of course a study of the original score was indispensable.

The organist was apt to use the 16-ft. pedal stop far too much. In orchestral music, the double-bass, which it represented, was not worked nearly so hard. More use should be made, for the lowest part, of pedals without the 16-ft. tone; and an organ should have a piston in a convenient position for taking in all pedal stops that happened to be drawn. It was perfectly legitimate, in arrangements, for the organist to use his feet to help out any awkward manual passages. The incessant use of the lowest notes of the pedal board caused great monotony; and he would often play bass parts an octave higher.

When solo parts were employed, the problem was to provide a left-hand part consistent with the dignity of the instrument. A 'Song without words,' effective enough on the pianoforte, might be unsuitable for the organ, unless there were something in it besides mere melody and accompaniment. Many pianoforte pieces, however, had suggestions of orchestral colour about them, and were quite suitable; for instance, Henselt's 'Ave Maria,' Saint-Saëns's 'Bagatelle' No. 3, Debussy's 'Little Shepherd' from 'The Children's Corner,' and Kjerulf's 'Wiegenlied.' Some orchestral works also depended so little on their scoring that they might be treated as pianoforte compositions; for instance, Delibes's 'Passepied' from 'Le Roi s'amuse,' and 'Le Berger' from 'Sylvia,' the Flute solo from 'Orfeo' (given in Berlioz's 'Instrumentation'), and Massenet's 'Angelus.' And the same with 'straight-forward' orchestral works not requiring any special variety of colour beyond the segregation of solo melodies and tutti passages. It was needless to be too particular about trying to reproduce solo instruments exactly. The prejudice felt by most organists against playing more than one note at a time on solo stops, while sound enough in relation to organ music proper, need not be extended to arrangements. A smoothly-voiced Clarinet in a swell-box sounded quite delightful in 3rds and 6ths. In the Romanza from Mozart's 'Nachtmusik' for strings, he would play the melody, in places in two parts, on the Clarinet; it was unreasonable to spoil the music by monotony of effect on the ground that it was written for strings only.

To some qualities of tone the organ could only approximate. How was the string tone-group to be dealt with? The wrong way was to resort to stops of the Gamba variety—except in such special cases as a violoncello obbligato in some of Mendelssohn's accompaniments. He would suggest that those parts of the organ not required for other purposes should be considered as 'strings'—anything from a Salicional to a small Open, including Lieblichs and a Swell Oboe. To represent muted strings, for a short passage one would use the Vox angelica or Voix celeste; but this soon became tiresome.

The wood-wind, when not solo, could easily be done by Gambas, Gemshorns, &c. The nearest thing to horns was not the stop so named, but perhaps a stopped Diapason; but for a long passage it was better to rely on judicious phrasing.

For representing brass, everything depended on the particular organ. The Great Trumpet and the Pedal Trombone were very often unsatisfactory. On his own organ there was a Solo Tuba in a swell-box, and this did very well. He would like to mention an effect contrived by Dr. Sinclair, of Hereford, who in Rachmaninov's Prelude obtained a curiously beautiful bell-like tone for the three bass notes of the main theme by coupling the Pedal to the Solo Clarinet.

The orchestral principle of so arranging chords that each of the tone-groups could stand well by itself must be remembered in adapting music for the organ; and the chords of an accompaniment should be complete for its own manual. This point was sometimes obscured in pianoforte arrangements.

It was too often forgotten that pace was not absolute but relative; one should not be tied to the metronome mark. The pace of the same piece should be varied for different instruments. Most organists played too fast; the organ was rather a ponderous instrument, and such playing brought that defect into prominence.

Then, as to phrasing. In playing transcriptions, it was sad to find, the worst phrasers were usually the most conscientious people. It should be realised that the 'slur,' the organ composer's accepted sign-post, meant different things in other music at different times. Yet he had heard an organist, playing a violin piece, lift his hand from the notes at the end of every bow mark!

As to rhythm, the difficulty here was the fact that accent, which was the main part of rhythm, was only attainable by staccato playing, and this soon became unpleasant on the organ. Bach was aware of this, and in his organ music the first beat of the bar stood out like the 'Left!' of a drill sergeant. Unfortunately the term 'rhythm' was used for two contradictory qualities in music, meaning (1) conformity to metre, (2) that elasticity of beat-value which prevented the recurring accent from becoming mechanical. The former was especially important on the organ, as there was no means (except the Swell Pedal, a crude device) for disturbing the even flow of tone, and in wedding and funeral marches, strong accent was essential.

On the whole, as staccato playing was too frequently overdone, he would suggest that 'one-hand staccato' should be more employed. A left-hand staccato was sufficient for infusing more energy into the rhythm, and did not draw so much attention to the device.

Lastly, he would plead for clarity in organ-playing. Even in England the fault of 'muddiness' still lingered. Too many stops, especially couplers, were pulled out, and too many notes put down. To adopt the metaphor of a friend, he would like organ-playing to be 'aerated,' and not like unleavened bread. In the days when organists fought shy of arrangements altogether, there was a natural tendency to heaviness of style, which was called 'solid' playing. Now, this was suitable enough to the bulk of organ music then, but not to modern 'arrangements,' and probably the objection to these latter was largely due to the slovenly playing of them. He thought few would object any more to them if unsuitable music were avoided, and if what was taken were played in a clean and honest manner.

Dr. Buck then played the following pieces in illustration of his remarks: the Flute solo from Gluck's 'Orfeo,' Grieg's Canon in B flat minor, Arensky's 'Marche Souvorov,' and Délibes's 'Passepied.'

The organ at the Town Hall, Manchester, built by Cavaillé-Coll in 1887, has recently been enlarged by Messrs. Lewis & Co., Ltd. On December 20, Dr. J. Kendrick Pyne gave the inaugural recital on the renovated instrument. The following is the specification of the organ:

REMARKS.

The tubular pneumatic action used throughout is of a form specially devised by Messrs. Lewis & Co.

Much of the internal pipe work is composed of 80 per cent. tin and 20 per cent. lead; only twelve pipes in the whole organ are zinc (Bass of Viole-de-Gambe in Swell). The new metal pipes of the Echo and Solo Organs extension are of the finest spotted metal.

There are twenty reservoirs supplying wind at pressures varying from 12 inches down to 3½ inches.

The main bellows are a triple-compound set (six feeders and two reservoirs) standing over a three-throw crank with 7 h.p. electric motor, operated by Booth's electrical apparatus through noiseless chain and helical spur gear, and regulated by Booth's patent automatic starter-controller, the whole mechanism being built upon a steel girder framing, independent and complete.

The special controller has been proved to effect a saving in current of from 60 per cent. to 70 per cent. over other electrical systems, and is operated by a simple push-button switch in the organ console. Current consumption under two units per hour.

The scheme and specification were prepared by Mr. J. E. Taylor, in the City Architect's Department, and the work throughout supervised under the direction of the city architect, Mr. Henry Price.

Mr. S. Royle Shore recently made a very successful lecturing tour in the diocese of Canterbury, with the object of awakening interest in congregational singing. By means of illustrations sung by small local choirs, the lecturer was able to show convincingly that simple music, other than of the modern measured type, can be easily learned and sung by the average congregation. The effective use of antiphonal singing by choir (in unaccompanied harmony) and congregation (in unison) was shown by the performance of some of the canticle settings from ancient sources, as edited by Royle Shore and Francis Burgess, and published by Messrs. Novello.

The fourth annual report of that excellent musical charity, the Organists' Benevolent League, shows that it is growing in usefulness. It is also clear that there are many cases that can be met only by permanent relief. At present the League is able to do no more than make single grants. It is to be hoped that organists will speedily place the League on such a foundation that it will be able to improve on the present temporary methods of relief. The secretary is Mr. T. Shindler, and the headquarters are at the Royal College of Organists.

The usual Lenten performance of Bach's Mass in B minor was given at Westminster Abbey on April 3 by the Bach Choir, under the direction of Dr. H. P. Allen. A vast congregation was present, and the occasion was deeply impressive both as a performance and as a spectacle. Sir Frederick Bridge was at the organ, and the solo parts were sung by Miss Rhoda von Glehn, Miss Muriel Foster, Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow.

The first Festival of the recently-formed Largs and District United Free Church Choirs Association (the object of which Association is the improvement of Church praise) took place in the Clark Memorial Church, Largs, on Wednesday in Holy Week. The singing of seven combined choirs, numbering some 140 voices, was most praiseworthy. The music sung included Smart's Te Deum in F, and Stainer's 'The Crucifixion,' the solos being taken by Mr. W. Taylor and Mr. Fred J. Borthwick. The organists were Mr. Hubert L. Bowers and Mr. J. Bonar Ward, and the conductor was Mr. William H. Stocks, organist and choirmaster of the Clark Memorial Church, Largs, the original founder of the Association. The Rev. W. Mackintosh Mackay gave a short address on the subject of Church praise.

The Liverpool Church Choir Association held its annual meeting on March 30. The report showed that the Festival held in December last, though a pronounced artistic success, resulted in a deficit of £22 17s. 6d. It is a pity that an organization doing such good work in the cause of Church music should not be able to pay its way, but the executive may console themselves with the reflection that in failing to pay their expenses, they are in good Festival company.

The inauguration of a new organ at Ballybricken Parish Church was celebrated on March 6, with a sacred concert in which Mr. W. Henry Murray took part as organist, composer, and conductor.

On Sunday, March 29, a very successful performance of Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' (in Latin), was given at St. Mary-Star-of-the-Sea, Hastings, the Church being crowded. Mr. Henry Poole, organist and choirmaster, presided at the organ.

On Sunday, April 5, Weber's Mass in E flat, with orchestral and organ accompaniment, was performed at Christ Church, Morningside, Edinburgh. Mr. Herbert A. Carruthers was organist, and Mr. James A. Carruthers, organist and choirmaster of the Church, was conductor.

Handel's 'Passion of Christ,' in an abridged version, was performed by the choir of St. Thomas's Church, Heaton Chapel, Stockport, on March 29. Mr. Harry S. Greenwood officiated as organist and conductor, and the soloists were Miss Bertha Marsh and Miss Edith Simpson.

A performance of Thomas Adams's sacred cantata 'The story of Calvary' was given by the choir of St. Michael and All Angels' Church, Smethwick, Staffs, on Palm Sunday. The soloists were Messrs. W. G. Price, S. Bloomer, and W. E. Day. Mr. F. T. Tookey, organist of St. Chad's, Smethwick, was the organist, and Mr. Bernard G. Payne (organist of the church) conducted.

Dr. C. W. Pearce's Passion Cantata, 'The Man of Sorrows,' was sung at St. Clement's, Eastcheap, E.C., on the evening of March 31 by the choir of the Church, under the direction of the composer, who presided at the organ. The solo parts were sung by Master F. Tyzack, Mr. E. Anderson, Mr. C. Cooper, Mr. J. Crewes, and the Rev. Minor Canon William Russell, Rector of St. Clement's, who sang the Priest's part in the Miserere which preceded the Cantata. The interpretation was in every respect reverent and sympathetic. The old English chorales were heartily sung by a large congregation, which included Sir George and Lady Martin and a number of well-known musicians.

The choir of St. Barnabas, Dover, sang 'The Story of Calvary' (Thomas Adams) on April 1, under the direction of Mr. Thomas H. Hill. The soloists were Mr. E. C. Herring and Mr. W. T. Pudney.

A special service was held at St. Paul's Church, Worcester, on April 2, to dedicate the new organ. Stainer's 'Crucifixion' was performed, Mr. J. Phipps presiding at the organ.

Elgar's 'The Light of Life' was sung at St. John's Church, St. Leonards, on April 8, under the direction of Mr. Leonard O'Connor. The performance was entirely satisfactory, both choir and soloists—Miss Edith Taylor, Miss Millicent Raper, Mr. Herbert Guy, and Mr. A. H. Crouch—acquitting themselves well. Mr. T. S. Guyer was at the organ.

GOOD FRIDAY AND EASTER SERVICES.

Stainer's 'Crucifixion' was performed at St. Peter's Church, North Taunton (Mr. F. Archibald Curtis); the Free Church, Hampstead Garden Suburb (Mr. W. C. Webb); St. Bede's Parish Church, Hartington Road, Liverpool (Mr. Ernest H. Smith); Broomwood Road Wesleyan Church, Clapham Common (Mr. G. Harold Paine); Regent Square Presbyterian Church (Mr. Allan Brown); and the Church of St. Alphage, London Wall (Mr. Arthur C. Tattersall).

Mauder's 'Olivet to Calvary' was given at Bootle Parish Church, Lancashire (Mr. W. G. Jones), and Kensal Rise Wesleyan Church (Mr. Charles E. Ransom). 'Messiah' was performed at Wimbledon Parish Church (Mr. Cecil Henman); Sullivan's 'The prodigal son' at Carbis Bay Wesleyan Church (Mr. Ernest White).

At St. Luke's Church, Slyne, Lancaster, a highly satisfactory performance of Benedict's Passion Music from 'St. Peter' was given before a large congregation on Good Friday. Mr. T. A. Beckett presided at the organ.

SONGS.

- Four Dramatic Songs: Imagination, Unwelcome, St. Andrews, Over the hills.* By Cyril B. Rootham.
What the bullet sang. By William H. Speer.
The voyage of love. Song-cycle by A. von Ahn Carse.
A rann of wandering. By Hamilton Harty.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Rootham's four dramatic songs are a considerable addition to the literature of English lyric-writing of the highest type. The poems, by Mary E. Coleridge, are in themselves mood-pictures laden with music, and the composer aims at intensifying their mood, and with a sympathetic rise and fall of vocal phrase to give full expression to their musical suggestion. A mere 'tune' would clash; it would take the upper hand and stifle the poetry. Mr. Rootham gives his music a higher function, which enters into the author's subtlety and vivifies its meaning. This ideal characterizes all four of the songs, of which little individual description is needed. 'Imagination' is an eloquent tone-picture of some austerity. In 'Unwelcome' there passes

' . . . a woman with the West in her eyes,
And a man with his back to the East.'

The suggestion of a chill over joy and feasting cast by such a visitation is well conveyed by a recurring figure that throws weirdness and pathos into the music. 'St. Andrews' is a glimpse of a town cheerless by day, a vision of fairyland by sunset. In 'Over the hills' a ground-bass, to apply an unsuitable academic term, gives the touch of relentless, hidden tragedy that is hinted rather than expressed in the recurring words:

'We went together over the hill,
But I came back alone.'

The songs are designed for a high voice, and only in the last case is a male voice exclusively required. They deserve the attention of vocalists who take their art seriously.

The same may be said of Mr. Speer's 'What the bullet sang,' a dramatic setting of dramatic words by Bret Harte. Here, again, the music is made to heighten the suggestion of a significant poem. It abounds in ideas, all brought to the service of this one object.

Mr. Von Ahn Carse's cycle exemplifies the lyrical and more purely melodic style, which is fitted with perfect appropriateness to neat, unassuming and effective words by Harold Simpson, expressing the loneliness and yearning of an exiled lover and the joy of return. There are five numbers, of which 'Sad are the winds' appeals to us most. The titles of the remainder are 'Fly, little barque,' 'Far away' (which shows some effective alternation of minor and major), 'Out of the storms,' and 'Into the haven.'

'A rann of wandering' illustrates Mr. Hamilton Harty's decision of style and fluent musicianship. The words are by Padraic Colum.

Irish Minstrels and Musicians. With numerous dissertations on related subjects. By Capt. Francis O'Neill, author of 'Irish folk-music: A fascinating hobby.' Profusely illustrated.

[Chicago: The Regan Printing House, 1913. For sale by Lyon and Healy, Chicago, and by M. H. Gill & Son, Dublin.]

This handsome volume of close on 500 pages is a striking evidence of boundless enthusiasm on the part of an Irish exile, Capt. Francis O'Neill, who till recently was Superintendent of the Chicago Police. It must have cost immense labour to accumulate the memoirs here given of itinerant harpers, fiddlers, and pipers, dancing-masters, pipe-makers, harp-makers, collectors, &c. Capt. O'Neill not only draws on the works of Bunting, Walker, Hardiman, Petrie, Joyce, and Flood, but he adds a wealth of information gleaned from both hemispheres.

Some of the chapters make delightful reading, especially those on 'Reverend Musicians,' 'Gentlemen Pipers,' and 'The Dancing-Master.' To add to the value of the book there are hundreds of illustrations—pictorial and musical. Interspersed in the letterpress are some very pretty verses, evidently from the pen of the versatile author, who frankly tells us in his Preface that he is 'unrestrained by the dictates of commercial wisdom,' and that the appreciation of his labours by the student of Irish music 'will soften the personal sacrifice which the publication of such a large volume entails.' We sincerely trust that the present beautifully produced work will meet with a wide circulation, while to the student of Irish folk-music it is sure to make an irresistible appeal.
